After a long fatigue, we repented of having exposed ourselves to the hazards of raging seas, to petition for a redress of injuries to which we were every day liable, without knowing but a greater and more terrible tempest than what we had suffered at sea hung over our heads upon land. The last storm was no more than the consequence of a natural cause, which distinguishes the seasons; for the works of nature are but, in other words, the operations of Providence to promote the common good of mankind. But the author of this tempest had nothing good or humane in him; he was a turbulent and ambitious youth, and so much the more dangerous in having the power of the whole empire to support him. Who could have courage enough to approach him with a petition, or open his mouth in behalf of the temple to the most sacrilegious of all men living? It would be repugnant to common sense to expect mercy out of cruelty, and to place the hope of preservation in the breasts of persecutors. It was sufficiently apparent that he would condemn every one who had refrained from doing honours to that famous temple, which the east and west worshipped as religiously as if it had been the sun. Besides, if an audience had been granted, what could be expected but certain death? In this dilemma I thus addressed my colleagues:

"Why should not we die then, especially when he that lays down one life for the laws and religion of his country, is sure of a life more glorious in exchange? But he must be a madman that casts away a life at this rate, which no body is the better for. So that such an instance as this would but be the addition of one more to the roll of our former calamities; especially, as we are under the characters of ambassadors, and in a point where the principals are more concerned than the deputies. Nor shall we want envious and malignant spirits, and of our own people, to make the worst of things, and to impute any glorious resolution to a wrong cause. The ambassadors, they will say, found themselves at a crisis, and so quitted their station, deserting the commonwealth when they found it in danger, in order to the promoting of their own private interest. But the less must give way to the greater, private matters to public; and wherever this order is broken or confounded, the whole government is at stake, and out of frame. In one word, where the polity of the Jews comes once to be subjected to the question, it is a step towards abolishing the very name of the nation, where there is an agreement of power and good will in the doing it. We cannot, in fine, abandon the Alexandrian Jews, for the whole nation of the Jews is here at stake;

No. 43.

"and it is to be feared, that this cruel oppression will extirpate us all from off the face of the earth. It will be said, perhaps, that, if we can make nothing of it either way, we are at liberty to come off at last, in case of the worst. To this I answer, he that makes such a proposition has neither courage or foundation in scripture in him. Generous natures will hope the best, and holy writ lays the foundation of that hope to all those that heartily embrace the doctrine. Who knows now, at last, but this may be for a trial of our constancy and virtue in the worst of fortunes? Adieu then to all worldly comforts and supports; they are false and fickle, and leave us when we have most need of them. Adieu, I say, to vain confidences; and let us cast ourselves in a firm and lively faith upon the goodness of God, who hath so often delivered us already, and will never forsake us." After this manner we comforted ourselves, and one another, in all cases of surprize, and in the hopes of better times.

Pausing after this address, we applied ourselves to the bearer of this dismal news. "You do not consider (we told him) that what you have said is but as so many live coals thrown into our ears as you have uttered words; for you have only told us the matter of fact, which tends nothing to our satisfaction without the reason of it, and without knowing what it was that led the emperor into this horrid resolution."

The bearer thus replied: "To tell you that which every body knows, Caius has a mind to pass for a god; and looking upon the Jews as the only people likely to oppose him in his blasphemous pretence, he resolved, if possible, to remove that obstacle out of the way, towards facilitating the work. This could not be better done, he thought, than by beginning with a contempt and indignity upon the holy temple, which was allowed, at all hands, to be the most glorious piece in the universe, both for ornament, and a vast treasure, in presents and oblations, which had been so many years in collecting, and which Caius, in the conclusion, had the confidence to assume to himself. Besides, he was now further exasperated by Capito, the quaistor; which Capito was also the receiver of the tributes in Judæa, and a man that, by his actions and oppressions, had made himself odious to all the provinces. He came thither poor; and when he had so enriched himself by fraud and corruption, that he was afraid of being called to an account, he found it his best way to complain first, and to prevent an accusation of calumny, by the improvement of an opportunity that lay fair for his purpose.

"Jamnia is a city of Judæa, wonderfully populous, and the inhabitants all Jews, some few strangers excepted, that, to our cost, came thither out of the bordering countries to see fashions: besides that, they are never without some plot or other against the laws and customs of the Jews. As soon as these people came to understand the extravagant ambition of Caius after divine honours, and his deadly malice to the whole Jewish nation, they caused an altar to be erected of clay wrought into bricks, out of pure spite to the citizens: for they well knew that this violation of our laws would prove the ground of a quarrel, and so they found it; for the Jews gathered together presently, and demolished the altar; the other party applying themselves to Capito for redress. Capito was the author and contriver of the whole tragedy; and consoling himself to see every thing succeed so to his wish, he sent an account of it immediately to Caius, with inflaming aggravations to make the matter look worse than it was. This arrogant, headstrong prince had no sooner received the intelligence, than he gave orders for erecting a glorious Colossus in the temple of Jerusalem, in revenge of the brick altar that was pulled down in Jamnia: and this was done by the counsel of his two advisers, Helico, the

"court buffoon, and Apelles, the tragedian, who, from a libertine in his youth, went over afterwards to be an actor upon the stage; a sort of people that are looked upon, in their theatrical liberties, to be the loosest and the most shameless of all professions. These were the men that Caius pitched upon to instruct him in the arts of singing and raillery, without so much as ever thinking of the duties of justice, and the care of maintaining the public peace. Thus did Helico, like a scorpion, attack the Jews with Egyptian venom, and Apelles, at the same time, as an Ascalonite; that is to say, as a member of a nation that is never to be reconciled to the bordering Jews."

Every word of this wounded us to the very soul. However, these learned counsellors lived to receive the reward due to their impious actions. Apelles was commanded by Caius, on several crimes being exhibited against him, to be laid in irons, and put to exquisite torture at particular intervals, and so consequently to a lingering death. Helico was afterwards put to death by Claudius, successor to Caius, for crimes of the like nature.

C H A P. XIII.

Petronius finds great difficulty in executing the command of Caius for erecting his statue in the temple of Jerusalem.

AT this time arrived the order of Caius for erecting and consecrating his statue, drawn up not rashly, but with all the care and accuracy possible. Petronius, governor of Syria, was expressly commanded to draw out one half of the army that lay upon the river Euphrates, as a guard of defence against any inroads and incursions of the eastern kings and nations, and with these troops to attend the statue, not for the solemnity of the dedication, but for a terror to any that should dare to oppose him. "Cruel prince! who well knew that these people would rather die a thousand deaths than submit to such an imposition. Wherefore then bring out an army, but to consecrate the impious act with the blood of many thousand innocents?"

Petronius having perused the order, was divided within himself as to the execution of the commission. There was danger in refusing, and danger in delaying; besides infinite difficulties, on the other hand, in case of compliance; for he made no doubt of the Jews standing out all extremities, and encountering all hazards. Nations in general are tender and jealous of their privileges and customs, but the Jews are particularly so, as they believe their laws to be of a divine stamp, and are trained up to the love and study of them from their infancy. They are forcibly impressed on their minds; and the more they think of them, the greater reverence they have for them. They treat all their proselytes with the privileges of free citizens; and the veneration they have for the dignity of their profession is so sacred, that they would rather part with any thing than the minutest point of their duty. But there is nothing which they hold in so much esteem as their temple, which appears from the law, that makes it death, without mercy, for any man to set foot within the sanctuary, while the exterior part is open to all of their own nation from whatever quarter they come.

This was a matter of such great importance, that Petronius bethought himself over and over upon it, without coming to any resolution. He called a kind of council in his own mind, and, upon summoning up divers arguments and opinions, this was the result: That there must be no innovation in matters of religion; first, because nature and equity are both against it; secondly, for fear of unhappy consequences, not only from God himself, but the passions of violent, revengeful men. He also adverted to the prodigious extent of this populous nation, that was not comprehended within the space of one country, but diffused almost throughout the world. All the provinces of the continent, and the islands, were peopled with them; so that their numbers were not much inferior to that of the natives. To provoke, therefore, so many myriads of men, must appear hazardous; for a general insurrection might probably arise in all countries at once, to repel this injury, and thereby give birth to an insuperable war; without taking notice of the vast numbers of inhabitants in Judæa, remarkable for their extraordinary strength and mighty valour, being ready, at all times, to die gloriously, rather than abandon or forsake the rites of their country; though, in the opinion of detractors, they are called barbarous, when, in fact, they are free born, and brave men.

The governor entertained jealousy also of the troops on the other side of the Euphrates, as Babylon, and several other provinces, he knew to be in the interest of the Jews. He was well assured that large sums of money were annually remitted to the temple in the name of first fruits, through passages difficult and dangerous, which their piety and resolution rendered easy. He had therefore reason to apprehend, that, as soon as they heard of this new dedication, they would immediately rise up in arms, beset, surround, and cut them to pieces.

When Petronius had revolved these particulars in his mind, he reflected a little on the humour and character of his master. He considered that the person under whose command he was to act, was a young prince, whose will being his law, it was dangerous to oppose, whether right or wrong: that should he obey the command of the emperor, fierce war would be the consequence, and the event precarious. On the other hand, should he disregard the royal mandate, his destruction must answer for it at the hands of Caius.

C H A P. XIV.

Petronius, governor of Syria, gives orders for making the statue of the emperor Caius. The principal of the Jews refuse to receive it. They send deputies to remonstrate with Petronius upon the occasion, and to prevent the execution of Caius's order.

MANY of the Roman officers, who served under Petronius in the government of Syria, were inclined to undertake a war, taking it for granted, that the rage of the prince would fall upon them first as the authors of a sedition. What gave them opportunity for this was, their having time to deliberate matters whilst the statue was preparing; for it was not yet sent over from Italy. This seems to have been a special act of Providence in favour of the Jews, to protect them from an insufferable injury. Had this happened, the consequences would have been dreadful. Confusion and disorder would have immediately broke out in the violation of their laws, before they could have consulted on due methods of proceeding; for sudden events despoil the force of reason.

Petronius, at length, gave orders for a statue to be fabricated in a place not far from his residence, and sent for the greatest masters of Phœnicia to advise withal about it, and, on their coming, supplied them with the necessary materials, appointing Sidon as the place for the work. He sent notice, likewise, of the emperor's pleasure to the high priests and magistrates of the Jews, advising them patiently to submit to the mandate of his master, and guard against the ills that threatened them on their refusal. He acquainted them that he had a numerous army of Syrians at hand, who were prepared to lay waste the whole country with fire and sword. Petronius was of opinion, that, if he could but soften the minds of these grandees, the multitude of courtiers would follow their example. But he was grossly mistaken in his conjecture; for the bare mention of the affair threw them into such consternation, that they burst into a profusion of tears, and, after expressing every token of lamentation, thus exclaimed: "What avails all our former felicity, to arrive, at an advanced period of life, to be eye-witnesses of that which none of our ancestors beheld before? But we will sooner deprive ourselves of those eyes than survey so great an abomination."

The report of this strange innovation no sooner reached Jerusalem, and the region of Judæa, than the people, all as one man, proceeded towards Phœnicia, where Petronius then resided. The officers of the Roman governor, upon first sight of their prodigious multitude, advised him to take care of his own security. As the Jews advanced still nearer and nearer, they appeared as a cloud overspreading the country, but without either arms or guards. The air was filled with outcries and lamentations; and when the noise was gone, the echo still continued. At length, when the clamour ceased, they entertained themselves with discourses and ejaculations suitable to the melancholy occasion. They marched in six divisions, old men, young men, and boys; old women, young women, and virgins; three on the one hand, and three on the other.

When they came within sight of Petronius, who was seated in a chair of state, they fell prostrate before him, all in their ranks as supplicants, observing such decorum in their action, as if they had been actuated by one spirit. Petronius commanded them to rise and draw near, which they obeyed with much reluctance. At length, covered with sackcloth and ashes, they advanced towards the governor, with their hands behind them, like condemned prisoners, when one of their chiefs thus addressed him:

"We are without arms, to shew that we bring no hostile intention with us; but those hands, that nature gave us for the use of arms, are put out of condition to serve us in that capacity. We bring our very bodies at mercy too, our wives, children, and families, in quality of petitioners; first to Petronius, and then, by his means, to Caius. We have not left one soul at home; and our prayer is either that we may be all preserved, or all destroyed. We are naturally lovers of peace; and it is our interest, as well as our inclination, to be, in regard to benefits we receive from it. When Caius came to the empire, and the notice of it to Vitellius, your predecessor in the government, at that time living among us, we were the first of all Syria to congratulate his accession to the sovereignty, and to spread the joyful news of his elevation throughout other cities and places. Was it not our temple also that first offered up vows and sacrifices for the happiness of his life and reign? and is our's to be the first, if not the only temple, that is to be deprived of the exercise and enjoyment of our religious worship? If the quitting of our houses, privileges, and possessions, public and private, may be worth your acceptance, we are ready to lay them all at your feet. Also our plate, household goods, or what is more precious, you may have it all for asking; and with so good an heart, that we shall reckon ourselves upon the receiving hand, even in what we give upon this single condition, that the temple may stand as it did, and continue inviolate, as we received it from our forefathers. Grant us this single request, and we ask no more. But if nothing less than our religion will content you, take away our lives too, without forcing us upon a life of torment, worse than a thousand deaths. We are threatened here with armed troops and military executions, if any of us shall presume to obstruct the intended dedication. No man is so mad as to set himself up in contradiction to his master; but let them strike, cut, and hack us to pieces, and do all that a victorious enemy can pretend to, so long as they may do it securely, without any danger of their own blood. What needs an army to be drawn out for such an execution, where there is only a massacre on the one side, and not so much as a defence on the other? As for sacrifices, we may do the work of our own priests ourselves; upon the victims of our own wives, brothers, sisters, sons, and daughters, and content ourselves with the denomination of men, women, and children slayers; for hard cases must have hard names. What have we to do, after spilling so much innocent blood of other people, but to lay violent hands upon ourselves, and mingle our own with it in one common mass? ending our days, at last, with this prayer in our mouths, that God will not be offended with us for an action that carries along with it so great a deference to the authority of the emperor, and at the same time to the sanctity of our holy profession. This will be the case, if we have hearts to condemn a life that a good man would be ashamed to lead. There is an old story among the Greek fables of Gorgon's head, that turned every thing to stone that did but look upon it. The report, it is true, is but a fiction, and yet not without some emblematical and striking resemblances of truth, especially in many accidents of astonishment and surprize. The displeasure of a master is mortal, or somewhat else that comes near it. Now, Petronius, do you imagine, if some of our people should see such a statue brought into the temple, as you have here before you, (which heaven forbid,) they would not look like men turned into marble at the spectacle? their eyes set in their heads, and nature itself out of condition for all the offices of life? But to come to a conclusion; we do not desire an absolute discharge of our obedience, but time and leave only to address ourselves, by our deputies, to his imperial majesty for relief. Who knows but he may be wrought upon to grant us a toleration of our holy laws and worship, and a liberty in common with the rest of the world? For we ask no more than what all other nations enjoy without exception, in the preservation of those rites and traditions that we have received inviolate from our forefathers, in favour both of customs and manners. Who knows, I say, but such a remonstrance as this may soothe him? The hearts of princes are variable, like those of other people; neither is their displeasure immortal. We are wounded here with calumnies; and there is no remedy like truth, which is all we have to offer, and that we may not be condemned without an hearing; or, to put it at worst, if we should find the prince inexorable, the cause is but where it was; for he may still do the same thing afterward, that he would have done before. Our last request, Petronius, in the names of this vast multitude, is, that you would be so generous as not to oppose an embassy that has so many thousands of lives depending upon it; and be pleased to know that we do not contend for profit (but for piety) in any other sense than as godliness is the greatest gain."

CHAP. XV.

Petronius applies to Caius concerning the Jews. Diffimulation of the emperor.

THIS remonstrance, in behalf of the Jews, was uttered with such ardour and emotion of mind, that it moved the compassion of all that heard it, as appeared by their looks and gestures. It wrought likewise upon Petronius among the rest; for the governor was a man of a mild and gentle disposition, and easily prevailed upon either by words or actions. The Jews were thought to ask nothing but what was fair and equitable, and the sight of the petitioning multitude was truly affecting. Entering into a consultation with his friends, he found that many, who just before were rigidly against the petitioners, were divided; some disposed to favour them, others undetermined as to the matter; which difference of temper highly pleased him. He was sensible, at the same time, of the implacable spirit of the emperor, and the innate barbarity of his mind, yet he seemed much actuated by a regard for the piety and religion of the Jews.

We cannot determine by what motives he was thus influenced in favour of the Jews; whether he had been at any time instructed in their learning, and imbibed some notions from their books, since he had obtained the government of Asia and Syria, in the several towns of which the Jews resided in abundance; or whether he acted as a man whose genius led him to the study and knowledge of things in general; or whether God suggests good counsel to good men for the common benefit of themselves and the public, as it fell out upon this occasion. The statuary had their orders to provide as perfect a figure as art and hands could make, but not to hasten, as works expedited are seldom of any duration, whereas perfect models endure time and age.

The Jews, however, could not obtain leave to send deputies; nor, indeed, was it safe for them to commit an affair of this importance to the will of a prince, at once powerful, cruel, and fantastical; so that Petronius found it dangerous either to grant or refuse. At length he determined on sending a letter to Caius, without any accusation of the Jews; and imputing the cause of the delay of the dedication to the artists, who necessarily required a certain space of time to complete the statue. It occurred likewise to the governor, that such delays would inevitably occasion a longer respite, and that Caius, in the mean time, might suffer himself to be gained over. Besides, the grain was now ripe, and there was reason to fear that the Jews, abandoning themselves to despair for the sake of their religion, would push on their violence in contempt of their lives, destroy the harvest, and lay the whole country waste.

This was no idle apprehension; so that early care was taken, by Petronius, for reaping the grain, and gathering the fruits; partly by way of prevention, and partly for a public supply in case of need. It was at that time reported, that the emperor had some design of a visit to Alexandria; though it did not seem very probable that so great a prince should expose himself to the dangers of very tempestuous seas, with so prodigious a train, when the way about, by the rout of Asia and Syria, would have been much easier and safer. Had he taken this method, he might have embarked or disembarked at pleasure; having, at command, two hundred vessels for the use and service of the coasts, besides others, of considerable burthen, for navigating the ocean.

In consequence of this report, all the cities of Syria were under a necessity of procuring a sufficient store of provision, especially those on the sea-coast. A prodigious multitude was expected to come, not only from Rome, but other parts of Italy, besides numbers from the provinces that lay between, and those of all conditions, as men of rank, civil and military, together with soldiers, mariners, and servants; for all of whom there was not only required necessary accommodation, but a supply of every thing suitable to the dignity of so illustrious a prince.

It was the general opinion of those whom Petronius consulted upon the occasion, that the emperor, on perusing the contents of the letter, would commend the prudence of deferring the dedication; not so much for the sake of gratifying the Jews, as the advantage of securing the harvest. The letter, in fine, was approved, transcribed, and dispatched with all possible expedition. Caius no sooner inspected it, than he betrayed a visible indignation; and at length burst out into this exclamation.

"Well, Petronius! you are yet to learn obedience to an emperor. Your continuance in office swells your ambition. You know not that I am persuaded of your partiality for the laws of the Jews, a nation to me most obnoxious. You neglect the command of your prince. You shew yourself a coward to a base multitude, when you have a power under your command sufficient to encounter the kings of Parthia, and the whole force of the east. You urge compassion for neglect of duty, and plead the harvest as an excuse; but it shall not be long before your head shall pay the forfeit. You likewise adduce, by way of palliating your disobedience, the gathering in of the fruits, as though, if Judæa were barren, the bordering provinces were not able to supply provisions, or make up "the deficiency of a country, which is but one government, with all their increase. But why do I deign to reason upon this business? or why suspend the execution of my menaces on a miscreant that deserves my highest displeasure?"

After some pause, Caius determined to dissemble his anger for a time; and therefore dictated, to one of his secretaries, an answer to Petronius, apparently in commendation of the governor's foresight and precaution. He was fearful of some of his governors, lest they should introduce innovations, especially in large provinces, such as the track of land comprehending Syria to the Euphrates; so that having cajoled Petronius, in this letter, with formalities of respect, and fair words, he only concealed his resentment, which was implacable, till a fit opportunity should offer for shewing it; though he enjoined him, at all events, to attend to the dedication of the statue, in preference to all other pursuits.

CHAP. XVI.

King Agrippa comes to Rome, and is greatly affected on hearing of the dedication of the statue. His elaborate epistle to the emperor upon the occasion.

SOON after this king Agrippa came to Rome, to pay his duty to the emperor, after his usual manner, without any knowledge of what had passed between Petronius and Caius. However, from the emperor's clouded visage, he conjectured that some resentment lurked and was brooding in his breast. He considered with himself if he had not, either in word or action, offended him; but, being unconscious of any misdemeanor, he concluded, as was really the case, that his resentment was against others. Yet perceiving again that his stern aspect was directed at him, he fell into his former apprehensions. He was several times desirous of enquiring the cause, but as often put a restraint upon himself, lest his rash curiosity should bring upon his own head those menaces which were designed for others.

Caius, who was very expert in reading the mind in the visage, observing Agrippa fearful, thus addressed him: "Agrippa, I perceive you are in doubt, and will therefore remove your scruples. You cannot be ignorant, from the long time you have conversed with me, that I discourse with my eyes as well as with my tongue. The good people of your nation encroach a distinction from the rest of mankind, refuse Caius the honour of being stiled a god, and, in their contumacious disobedience, plunge themselves into certain destruction. It is my positive command to have the statue of Jupiter set up in their temple, and now multitudes are assembled from all quarters, under the pretext of supplicants, but, in reality, to trample my orders under their feet."

As the emperor was proceeding, king Agrippa suddenly changed colour, was seized with a total trepidation, and his legs failed him to that degree, that, without support, he must have fallen to the ground. He was at length conveyed to his apartment speechless, and almost motionless.

Caius, by this accident, was more exasperated against the Jews, and from it drew this inference. "If Agrippa, my familiar friend, who is indebted to me for so many good offices, has so great a veneration for the rites of his country, that he cannot hear a word against them without being affected almost to death, what must I expect from others, who have no consideration of that kind to prevail with them in my favour?"

Agrippa all that day was in a kind of stupor, till towards the evening he began to raise his head a little, and, with much difficulty, opened his eyes; though his sight was so much impaired, that he could not distinguish the persons who stood around him. A little after this he fell into a gentle repose, and seemed to rest better than he had done, from the

the drawing of his breath, and the beating of his pulse. When he awoke, he exclaimed, "Am I with the emperor? Is he present?" His attendants, in answer, bade him "be of good courage, as he was in his own apartment, and the emperor was not there." They desired him, as he had slept long enough, to raise himself a little, and look on those around him, who were his friends, domestics, true and faithful servants. The tenderness they expressed for him in his distress, brought him, in some measure, to himself again. Upon the physicians ordering the company to withdraw, that the patient might be quiet, and at liberty for remedies and refreshments, he said, "Trouble not yourselves about delicacies for my palate; a coarse diet, and good appetite, are all I ask; and more yet than I should make use of, if it were not for the hopes I have left me of living to be serviceable, even at this last extremity, to my miserable country."

These words were accompanied with a flood of tears. He contented himself with what was barely necessary to support existence, drinking water without the least mixture of wines; and having finished his meal, made this remark; "I have paid a debt to nature, and have nothing more left me to do, but dutifully to solicit Caius on the present melancholy state of the Jews." Having thus spoke, he called for a tablet, and wrote to the emperor as follows:

"SIRE,

"BETWIXT the fear and the reverence I have for your Imperial Majesty, in the dread of your high displeasure on the one hand, and in the veneration I have for the dignity of your sacred character on the other, I have rather presumed to lay my humble duty at your majesty's feet in writing, than to venture upon it in a verbal address.

"It may be laid down for a maxim, that all men living have a natural affection for the place where they were born, and an awful reverence for the laws they were brought up in; which is a truth that hath been abundantly asserted in the piety, great prince, of your profession and practice: and it is as natural for every man to approve of his own way, because we are governed, in particular cases, more by passion than by reason.

"As to myself, I need not inform you, Sire, that I am by nation a Jew, by birth of Jerusalem, the seat of the holy temple, that stands there dedicated, in a most peculiar manner, to the honour of the Most High God. As to my predecessors, some of them have been kings, others high-priests; upon which dignity they valued themselves more than upon the authority royal, inferring, that as God is above man, so the sacerdotal character is above the civil; the one exercising itself in Divine matters, and the other only in human.

"Such is the nearness of my relation and manifold obligations to this nation, country, and temple, that I cannot but implore your royal grace and favour on their behalf. First, for the nation, that they may not be forced over from the profession of their own religion to the contrary; especially considering how true and loyal they have ever been to your illustrious family; no people under the heavens so frank of their vows and prayers for the welfare and prosperity of your empire; or so free of their sacrifices and oblations, not only upon solemn festivals, but daily; and this not only in plausible words and forms, but with a piety of reverence and affection that came from their very hearts, and without any exceptions, saving only in cases of inconsistency with their laws and religion.

"I have this to say further now for the holy city, and the place of my birth, which is not to be looked upon as the metropolis only of Judæa, but of many other colonies that have been plant"ed from thence; as Egypt, Phœnicia, Upper and Lower Syria, Pamphylia, Cilicia, and several parts of Asia, as far as Bithynia and Pontus: and to in Europe, there is Thessaly, Bœotia; Macedonia, Ætolia, Athens, Argos, Corinth, and the better part of Peloponnesus: and not only the continent, but the islands also of most eminent note, are filled with Jewish plantations; as Eubœa, Cyprus, and Crete; to say nothing of those beyond the Euphrates: for, in short, a small part of Babylon, and some other governments excepted, there is hardly a city of eminence, but is in the possession of the Jews. That if this be the case, I am not a suitor for my own country alone, but for the common good of Asia, Europe, and Africa; sea and land, islands and continent, all under one: for the interest of the whole depends upon the same act of clemency: and I hope my confidence will be the more pardonable for the zeal I have to be an instrument in a mediation so much to the honour of Cæsar. For what can be more agreeable to the spirit and genius of so glorious a prince, than the ministering to fair an occasion of obliging the whole world at once; and consequently the perpetuating of your name and memory to all ages, as the guardian angel of mankind?

"You have been pleased, at the request of some particular friends, to make whole towns free citizens of Rome, and masters of those that were but servants before; and in so doing, your kindness was as great to the procurers of this bounty; as to the receivers of it. I am sensible of being under the command of a master; and yet give me leave to value myself upon the title of a friend too; a friend not inferior to many in dignity, but above all others in good-will and respect: for it has ever been so; and, in honour and gratitude, it must ever so continue. Yet, after all this, I have not the confidence to intercede for my countrymen for grants and privileges; no, not so much as for the common freedom or immunity from taxes. The grace that I have to beg would be of high advantage to them, it is true, and of no sort of inconvenience to Cæsar: for what greater blessing can a subject desire than the favour of his prince? Was it not Jerusalem that first congratulated Caius on his accession to the empire? Was it not Jerusalem again that sent the joyful tidings of it into all the neighbouring provinces? The very transaction of making the Jews subservient to such a revolution may deserve some sort of acknowledgment. As the eldest son of the family is reputed the most honourable, because it was he that first entitled his parents to the reverend names of father and mother, so that city, one would think, that first saluted Caius by the name of emperor, should be treated as well, at least, if not better, than any of the rest.

"I have been thus far an advocate for my country; but my last prayer must be for our temple. This temple, Caius, is the house of God; and there was never any image made with hands admitted into it. The works of painters and statuaries are the figures only of sensible gods; but for any artist to offer at any sort of representation of the invisible God was looked upon as an abomination. Agrippa, your grandfather, had a mighty reverence for this temple. Augustus provided expressly for supplying it with the first fruits from all quarters, and the offering of daily sacrifices in it. Your great grandmother had likewise a high veneration for it. Neither Greek, in fine, or barbarian, neither prince or potentate, no, nor the deadliest enemies we had, sedition, war, bondage, desolation, or the most destructive of other calamities, could ever prevail upon us to receive the idol of an image into the temple. Not that it had no enemies, but its religion was safe still; for being dedicated to the father and author of all things, it struck people into a dread of the judgments that frequently attend such violations; so that they durst not ven“ ture to sow the seeds of wickedness, for fear of “ reaping the fruits of it themselves. We need “ not to look abroad for instances, having so many “ nearer home.

“ In the reign of Herod, my grandfather, your “ grandfather, Marcus Agrippa, passed the com“ pliment upon him of a visit into Judæa, where he “ coasted along the sea-side up to Jerusalem. Upon “ a view of the temple, he was so transported “ with the glories of the fabric, the solemnities
 “ of the sacerdotal rites and ceremonies, the sim“ plicity of the people's manners, and, in fine, with “ the delight of so curious and wonderful a specta“ cle, that he was continually enhancing the ho“ nour of that illustrious structure; insomuch that,
 “ for the time he staid there, he never missed so “ much as one day's attendance, but still paid his “ constant visits, entertaining himself all the while “ with the contemplation of the holy vests, the or“ der of the sacrifices, and the awful majesty of “ the high-priest, in his rich pontifical robes, as he “ sat exalted above the rest. In fine, when he had “ presented his donations to the holy temple, and “ shewed himself as indulgent to the citizens as “ was possible, saving only an exemption from “ taxes, Herod accompanied Agrippa to the sea“ side, upon his return, where they exchanged mu“ tual acknowledgments of the high obligations
 “ they had the one to the other; the people strewing
 “ the passage all the way he went with boughs and “ flowers, in token of the veneration they had for “ his piety and bounty.

“ So, Sire, your great uncle Tiberius; was not
 “ he manifestly of the same principle and judg“ ment? Did not our religion and temple stand “ firm and safe through the whole three and twenty “ years of his reign, without any sort of inno“ vation? Nay, there is something that I both can “ and must say to Tiberius's honour; though I “ myself had very hard treatment from him. But “ truth is truth, and I am sure you will have the “ patience to hear it.

“ When Pilate was governor of Judæa, he dedi“ cated to Tiberius certain gilt bucklers; not so “ much out of respect to the emperor, as in pure “ spite to the Jews; and they were erected in the “ palace of Herod in Jerusalem. They had no “ sort of figure upon them, nor any thing that was “ prohibited, but barely the two names of the de“ dicator, and the person to whom they were dedi“ cated. When this story came to be noised among “ the people, they made application presently to the “ king's four sons, with some other branches of “ the royal family, and several other persons of “ eminence, to employ their interest with Pilate to “ have these bucklers removed, as a violation of “ the laws and religion of their country, which “ former kings and emperors had ever reputed sa“ cred. Pilate, who was harsh in his disposition, “ made the mediators so rude and churlish a reply “ to the motion, that it put the multitude into wild
 “ and disorderly exclamations.

“ Let people be quiet, they cried, that would be “ quiet, without inflaming men to war and sedi“ tion, and to the embroiling of the public peace,
 “ as if the honour of the emperor depended upon
 “ the violation of the law; never think of cover“ ing an injustice with so weak a pretext. If you “ have any thing to shew in your justification, from “ Tiberius, whether edict, letter, or any thing
 “ like it, shew us the warrant, and we have no more “ to do than to address ourselves, with humble pe“ titions and remonstrances, to our lord and master, “ for redress, without taking any further notice of “ Pilate; for Tiberius, we are sure, will never ap“ prove of this oppression.

“ This mode of applying themselves to Cæsar,
 “ by remonstrance or deputation, startled Pilate
 “ more than any thing else, for fear of laying him “ open to the world with the history of his other “ iniquities, as corruption, justice exposed to sale, “ rapine, violence, ruin, torments, innocent blood,

 “ and the most barbarous of cruelties. This cho-“ leric man was yet so divided within himself,
 “ that, as he had no mind to gratify the subject, so
 “ he had not the confidence to withdraw any thing
 “ that was made sacred by a dedication, being well “ acquainted with the humour of Tiberius in such “ cases. When the great men found matters in this “ state, and that Pilate repented himself of what “ he had done, however he dissembled it, they re“ presented the case to Tiberius by way of letter, “ in the most tender and dutiful manner that could “ be devised. Tiberius had no sooner notice of Pi“ late's language and behaviour, than he brake out “ into a violent passion, though a man not easily “ moved.

“ The first thing he did was, without any delay,
 “ to write to Pilate about it, with a severe rebuke
 “ for his insolence, and a positive command imme“ diately to remove the bucklers, and to have them “ transported into the temple that was built at Cæ“ sarea (a sea-port) in honour of Augustus. This “ expedient was as good as a salvo to the honour of “ the emperor, and the ancient customs of the city.
 “ These bucklers, in those days, had no gravers “ work upon them; and the point now in ques“ tion is the graven image. It was then only in “ the governor's palace; but it is now to be erected,
 “ as I am informed, in the sanctuary; a place so “ venerable and sacred, that only the high-priest is “ allowed entrance, and that but upon one day in “ the year too; and after a solemn fast, to burn in“ cense to the glory of God, and to offer up pray“ ers to the Almighty, according to custom, for a “ happy year, and the common peace of mankind.

“ If any other of our own people, either priest
 “ or layman, shall presume to enter this holy place, “ contrary to the law, it is made death without “ mercy. As for example, if the high-priest shall “ dare to enter above one day in a year, or three or “ four times over, for the purpose, upon that day “ of his entrance, it will most certainly cost him
 “ his life; so tender was our lawgiver of preserv“ ing the reverence of that holy place sacred and “ inviolate. Now if the rigour was so strict and ca“ pital in these nice cases, you may easily imagine, “ Sire, what an uproar it would create to have an “ image set up there, where the high-priest himself “ was not to be admitted but upon certain limita“ tions. How many of our priests would sacrifice “ themselves, their wives, and children, in one com“ mon pile of carcasses, rather than outlive the “ sight and sufferance of such an abomination?

“ This was the case in the days of Tiberius. As “ for Augustus, the best and the greatest prince “ that ever sat upon the imperial throne, his very “ name being given him out of a deference to his “ conduct and virtue, a prince to whom the whole “ world was indebted for the blessing of an univer“ sal peace, this illustrious prince, I say, upon some “ discourse he had concerning our temple, was given “ to understand, that no carved image was suffered “ to be brought into it, and for this very reason, “ that the invisible God was not to be represented “ by a visible figure. Upon which he was highly “ pleased with the reason, and the piety of the “ thing; and being a prince moreover of profound “ literature himself, he passed several reflections
 “ upon what had been said; partly recollecting
 “ what he had heard from the learned men he had “ constantly about him, and partly agitating the “ matter in his own thoughts. He was, in fine, so “ great a lover of letters, that his very table dis“ courses were as good as philosophical lectures;
 “ and his festival entertainments were accommo“ dated to the relief and satisfaction both of body
 “ and mind. Not to multiply instances in proof “ of this prince's generosity and good-will towards “ our people, I shall produce only two.

“ First, upon notice that there was not such care “ taken for the return of our first-fruits as the mat“ ter required, the emperor wrote to the governors

“ of the provinces in Asia, not to give any sort of “ interruption to the Jews meeting in their syna“ gogues; (but this liberty was not to be extended “ to any other.) For the Jews meetings are not “ like the feasts of Bacchus, to encourage drunken“ nels and sedition, but schools rather of piety and “ common justice. And as for their yearly first“ fruits, they were only intended for sacrifices to be “ offered up to God in the temple. This was fol“ lowed with an express command, not to put the “ Jews to any trouble about their meetings or col“ lections, after the manner of their country. I “ may mistake the word, but the substance I well “ know of, as your majesty will find in a letter
 “ from Norbanus, whereof this is a true copy.

C. Norbanus Flaccus, proconsul, to the magistrate of Ephesus, greeting.

“ Cæsar has signified unto me by letter, that “ whereas the Jews continue their old custom of “ religious meetings, and of gathering monies to “ be sent to Jerusalem, under the name of first“ fruits, it is his imperial majesty's will and plea“ sure that they be all left at liberty so to do. Of “ this you are to take notice, and to pay your obe“ dience accordingly.”

“ What clearer evidence, Sire, can there be in the “ world of Cæsar's opinion of our temple, than the “ indulging of the Jews in the public exercise of “ their worship, the freedom of their collections “ for holy uses, and the countenancing of them in “ other offices of piety?

“ There is yet another argument of the good“ will that Augustus bare us; that is to say, he or“ dered the daily sacrifice of a bull and two lambs, “ out of his own revenue, to be offered up to the “ honour of our God; and the practice of it hath “ been kept up ever since to this very day, without “ any intermission. This oblation Cæsar designed “ for the altar; and yet he very well understood “ that there was no image in the case, either within “ or without. But this wise and learned prince was “ nevertheless convinced of the necessity of having “ some glorious temple upon earth, dedicated in a “ peculiar manner to the invisible God; where men “ might offer up their devotions in hopes of having “ their prayers heard and granted, and without any “ visible figure.

“ With your majesty's leave, once again. What “ did your great grandmother, the empress Julia,
 “ but copy her great master and husband, Au“ gustus, in the profusion of her royal bounties “ upon this temple, as vessels of gold and silver, “ with other ornaments and presents to an inesti“ mable value? To what end was all this without “ image-work? For womens minds are commonly “ weak, and hard to be wrought upon, save only “ by sensible objects. This princess, however, that “ was as much beyond other women in perspicuity
 “ and judgment as in all other excellencies, sup“ plied the failings of the sex by study and medita“ tion, and gave herself up so entirely to thought “ and speculation, that she looked upon the practi“ cal part to be only a shadow of the other.

“ Now, great Sir, after so many glorious instances “ of tenderness and clemency out of your own fam“ ily, and those of your ancestors, in particular, “ from whom you have received both your life and “ government, be but so gracious towards our “ people as your predecessors have been every one “ of them before you. Here are emperors inter-“ ceding for our laws to an emperor; several au“ gust princes to one; grandfathers and great “ grandfathers to a grandchild; many to a single “ person. And what is the request at last, but “ this? They do humbly beg of you not to make “ void those laws and customs, that, from their first “ establishment, have been kept sacred to this very “ day. These acts, it is true, may be vacated, and “ these innovations wrought, perhaps, without any “ judicial vengeance upon the transgression; but “ whoever considers future uncertainty, and that “ Divine Justice is nevertheless sure for being some“ times slow, will tremble to think of the conse“ quences, if at the same time he believes there is a “ God.

“ If I should take upon myself to enumerate the “ infinite obligations I have to your majesty, my “ time would not serve me to recount them; nei“ ther would it become me to handle so sacred a “ subject; but the thing speaks itself. It is no se“ cret, Sire, that I was in irons, and that I stand in“ debted to yourself for my liberty; but I hope “ you did not ease me of those chains to load me
 “ with heavier. In that case my suffering was only
 “ in one part of my body, but in this my very soul “ sinks under the burthen. You did first deliver “ me from the dread of death, and you received me
 “ afterwards out of death itself; so that Agrippa “ desires no more now, than that Cæsar would pre“ serve the life he has restored; for otherwise, I “ have only outlived a less calamity to perish by a “ greater.

“ It is to your royal bounty that I am a debtor “ for the gift and dignity of a crown; and after “ that for the addition of another, and a greater “ command, in Trachonitis and Galilee. But af“ ter the multiplying of so many extraordinary fa“ vours upon me, do not deprive me, I beseech
 “ you, of things the most necessary of all others.
 “ I am not solicitous for fear of either losing my “ commission, or of being dragged to my former “ station; but my request is, once for all, that the “ laws of my country may be protected and main“ tained. For what will the world say of me else, “ either Jews or others? One of these two things “ must necessarily follow; either I shall be looked “ upon as a betrayer of my country, or as a person “ utterly lost to the honour of your friendship:
 “ and what could make me more miserable than “ either of them? For supposing myself to be still “ in the number of your confidants, and at the same “ time to suffer my country to go to destruction, I “ must certainly incur the character of a false man
 “ for employing my interest no better, upon a pre“ sumption that emperors and princes deny no such “ boons to their favourites. Or, if I should be so “ unhappy as to have lost your good graces, do not “ lay me in chains, I beseech you, as Tiberius did;
 “ but instead of my liberty, take away my life this “ very moment: that is all I ask. For what sig“ nifies life to me after the loss of your friendship, “ which is the only hope and comfort I have in this “ world?

C H A P. XVII.

*Caius, on the receipt of Agrippa's letter, orders Petro-nius to make an alteration in the temple of Jerusalem.
 Repents of it, and countermands his order. Goes to Alexandria, and claims divine worship.*

AGRIPPA, having dispatched this letter to Caius, kept close in his apartment, and waited the consequence with the greatest impatience and anxiety, under apprehensions that his importunity might be unseasonable; for the liberty and safety not only of Judæa, but of all the Jews over the face of the earth, were at stake upon it.

While the emperor was perusing this letter, he perceived his design had not succeeded: sometimes he was won over by the justice of so good a cause, and sometimes by the intreaties that were annexed to it. He condemned Agrippa in part, in part accused him, and laid to his charge the inordinate love and affection he discovered for his countrymen, who had been the only people that, through contumacy and disobedience, had refused the dedication of his image. However, he commended the king for not concealing

concealing his mind, which he said shewed a great soul, and generous disposition. To all outward appearance he seemed perfectly reconciled, and returned an answer to Agrippa's letter, couched in very mild and obliging terms. He gave the king a kind of promise, that there should be no more mention of the dedication; and at the same time ordered a letter to be written to Petronius, to suffer no innovation to be made in the temple at Jerusalem. However, to render it apparent that his disposition and resolutions were not entirely changed, it was particularly stated in the letter, that, though he exempted one metropolis, if any of the bordering cities were found to obstruct others that were desirous to erect temples, altars, or statues to him, such as gave the impediment were either to be put immediately to death, or be sent to him.

This was the spring of numerous seditions, and the cause of civil wars: it was no other than a shrewd and tacit abrogation of the favour he seemed to have conferred with so much simplicity and justice. Those who were enemies to the Jews discovered their hatred more against them than they did honour to Caius, who punished such very severely as were found to make any disturbance. He gave orders again for his statue to be set up in the temple; but Divine Providence so ordered it, that the people were quiet beyond expectation, nor afforded the least pretences for so doing, though the smallest fault was attended with the worst of consequences. Caius, indeed, continued busy and troublesome as ever. The favours he had granted rendered him uneasy, and his former desire re-kindled within his breast. He gave orders for another statue to be made at Rome, of brass, covered over with gold, throwing aside that cast for him at Sidon, lest any tumult should arise among the people. Care was taken to put this statue privately on ship-board, that it might be transported into Judæa, and set up in the temple before the people were aware. He also took shipping for Egypt, thinking thereby to accomplish his design the sooner.

The emperor had an extreme desire to see Alexandria, and spared no cost for accommodation upon his passage, being of opinion that this was the properest place in the world for advancing his fantastical designs, both with respect to the authority and example of a leading city, and its convenient situation for universal commerce. Indeed, it is generally found, that not only the lower class of men, but cities too imitate the example of their superiors.

Caius was so variable and inconstant in his temper, that if he had done any thing good, he would immediately repent of it, and pervert it into some prejudice and injurious effect. For instance, he once set some prisoners at liberty, and though nothing criminal could be alledged against them, ordered them to be put into chains again, merely to render their condition more miserable and helpless than it had been before. Others, that expected to die, were only banished; and they deemed it a very fortunate circumstance; not that they were conscious of any crime, but because the rigid and implacable disposition of their judge made them despair of pardon. These people, in fine, went into banishment with as much good-will as others commonly return from it, and deported themselves as cheerfully in their exile, as if they had been at liberty in their own habitations. But it was not long before Caius cut them all off by a military execution, without assigning any cause of offence; so that all the noble families in Rome were put into mourning for the loss of their friends and relatives by this execrable assassination.

If he presented any with sums of money, he would neither own it as a gift, or as a loan upon consideration of interest, but find some means or other to recover it as a fraud or theft, to the great detriment of those who received it. Nor did he deem it sufficient to force back what he had given, unless the whole estate, hereditary and acquired, went along with it. Those who imagined they stood highest in his favour and esteem, were dealt with in another manner, a pretence of friendship being the constant snare by which they were inveigled and fleeced to an intolerable degree. This was by putting them to prodigious expences to support frequent journeys, as whim or frolic led him, and offer him luxurious entertainments. Whole fortunes were sometimes squandered in the preparation for a single feast, insomuch that they were reduced to the necessity of taking up sums of money at interest, so great were the splendour and magnificence upon these occasions. This consideration, however, caused some to reject his friendship and kindness as not only unprofitable, but dangerous and injurious. Indeed, they found that all his plausible appearances were only snares to entrap the unwary.

Thus variable and violent were his temper and conduct; but the Jews, to whom he had a mortal aversion, most sensibly experienced their effects. He began with them at Alexandria, by seizing on their oratories, and filling them with statues representing his own image, and that without controul, none daring to dispute his authority. The temple of the holy city was now the only remaining sanctuary the Jews had left them, and this Caius had the confidence to attempt to appropriate to his own use and service, under the title of "The Temple of the New Jupiter, the illustrious Caius." Was there ever such despicable arrogance? A man arrogating the supremacy of the Deity! a man who has the world at his disposal, and cannot be content without aspiring to the heavens! Is the Almighty to have no part in a world of his own creation? Not so much as a field, a city, or a temple? Not the least trace of spot set apart for the service of the true God? What miseries did Caius draw upon himself and his empire by this execrable project! A thing as impious as impracticable, and not to be thought on without dread and horror.

CHAP. XVIII.

The cruelty of Caius towards Philo and the other deputies of the Alexandrian Jews.

WE shall now enter upon some particulars on the subject of the embassy, to which I was eye and ear witness, when we first opened our commission. We were no sooner entered into the presence than we plainly perceived, from the behaviour of the emperor, that, instead of a judge, we should find him our accuser and enemy. A fair and impartial judge would have examined the matter in counsel, investigated it from point to point, heard both sides indifferently in their turns, and, upon advice with the commissioners, passed sentence in open court. All this, and more, would have been done in form, especially in a case of this consequence, where the lives and liberties of so many thousand Alexandrian Jews were all at stake, and the matter so clear, that during a space of four hundred years it had never been so much as called in question. But so far was this merciless tyrant from complying with the ordinary methods of law and justice, that, on the contrary, he treated us with a brutality of insolence and contempt below the basest of slaves.

Mecænas and Lamias had two gardens betwixt the palace and the town, which, for three or four days, had been the retreat of Caius, who had designed this place as the scene of the tragedy of the Jews, while we ourselves were to be the spectators. His orders were for all the villas to be opened, his pleasure being to take a minute survey of each. It was not long before we were introduced, when, as soon as we beheld him, we prostrated ourselves with abundant reverence before him, and saluted him in the style of emperor and Augustus. He returned the compliment in such a manner, that we could not construe, with any degree of certainty; demanding with a smile, "If we were the race odious to the gods, who presumed to despise him, declared a god by all mankind except ourselves, and pay adoration to a god unknown?" At the same time, with hands uplifted, he burst out into an exclamation too blasphemous phemous to be repeated. These outrages were looked upon by our enemies as the prognostics of a certain victory; and there was not one attribute peculiar to God himself, but they ascribed to Caius.

Upon this occasion one Isidore, a crafty sycophant, took occasion to insinuate to Caius, that, "if he did but know the mortal hatred the whole body of the Jews had for his imperial majesty, he would abhor them much more than he did; for while the whole world were offering their prayers and vows for the safety of his person, and the prosperity of his government, the Jews were the only people that refused to do him honour." Upon hearing this calumny, we unanimously exclaimed, that "we were slandered and belied, having had our sacrifices in form for the prosperity of Caius and the empire; and that we did not feast upon the victims as some did, but committed the sacrifice whole to the sacred fire, and that upon three remarkable occasions. First, upon his accession to the imperial throne; secondly, upon his recovery from a dangerous illness, which so many nations lamented; and thirdly, for the success of his arms in Germany."

Caius, in a frantic tone, replied, "I grant you did sacrifice, but not to me; it was to another. Where then is the duty?" This unexpected answer threw us into the greatest consternation; we stood amazed, and knew not what to say. The emperor, in the mean time, went into the villas, surveying all the apartments, commending some, disapproving others, and giving orders for alterations to be made where he thought proper. We followed him up and down wheresoever he went, being all the time exposed to the reproaches of our enemies as objects of general ridicule. Indeed, the whole affair had the appearance of a farce, where the judge personated the accuser, and the accuser represented an unjust judge. It was one scene of faction and malice, without any semblance of justice and truth. But such accusers, and such a judge, ought much rather to be buried in silence, than have their proceedings exposed in writing. We could make no answer that could please him; and the laws of our country imposed silence in several cases.

When Caius had given some necessary orders about the buildings, he asked us, with a grave, serious countenance, what was the reason of our abstaining from swine's flesh? Our adversaries were highly gratified by this enquiry, as it indicated the disposition of the emperor, and was poignantly satiric upon us. Some of his attendants, however, reprimanded others for the licentious freedom of their smiles in the presence of the emperor, who might justly deem it the greatest indignity that could be offered him.

With respect to the question concerning the swine's flesh, our answer was, that several people and places had their several fashions and customs, and our adversaries were prohibited the use of some things, as we were the use of others. After some sarcasms had passed, we came to the point in question; but the emperor, perceiving that we were about to produce such vouchers that were irrefragable, broke off the discourse, and hastily withdrew into a spacious apartment, where, having walked and ruminated with himself some time, he came out, and demanded of us, "what we had to say?" We represented our case as concisely as possible; but he left us again, and withdrew into another apartment, where he had a collection of ancient paintings carefully deposited.

The prosecution of our cause being thus delayed, we grew impatient, and, indeed, had nothing to apprehend but certain death. In this anxiety of mind we betook ourselves to the true God, with prayer and supplication to protect us from the rage and menaces of the false one. In compassion to his servants, he mitigated the fury of the prosecutor, who only passed this short reflection, "that those men who would not believe him to be a god, were, in his opinion, rather miserable than wicked;" and having thus spoken, he retired, and commanded us also to withdraw.

Thus were we delivered from a scene of torment, banter, and ridicule, being grossly reviled by the surrounding spectators, as well as shocked with the blasphemies to which we were under a necessity of being ear-witnesses. What was the ground of his implacable rage against us, but that we were the only people in the world who refused to own him for a god? We speak not this as men fearful of death for the sake of the love of life; on the contrary, we should have deemed it the highest blessing, had it advanced the common cause of our profession. But in this case death would rather have been an ignominy; for the miscarriage of deputies are generally imputed to the ill conduct of their principals. This reflection pointed out to us the propriety of seeking a deliverance, while we were in anxious uncertainty as to the sentence the emperor might pronounce upon the issue; for how could he enter into the merits of the cause who would not hear the particulars? Was it not a matter of extraordinary weight and importance for all the Jews upon the face of the earth to rest their dependence upon us five deputies? If Caius had gratified the Alexandrians, what would have been the consequence? we should have had neither friends, towns, or oratories left. Our laws, rites, and privileges, would have been involved in one general destruction, and we must have sunk under the burthen of an insupportable oppression. Thus have we briefly shewn the cause that excited the aversion of Caius to the Jews, and induced him to persecute the whole race with unrelenting cruelty.

FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS.

of Josephus.

AS every nation has its peculiar marks of distinction, so amongst the Jews nothing tends more to aggrandize a family than a lineal succession to the sacerdotal dignity. In that respect I may put in my claim; not only as I derive my origin from a race of priests, but also from those of the first rank in the twenty-four courses which indicates the highest degree of advancement. By my mother's side I am allied to blood-royal; for the Asmonæan family, from which she is descended, enjoyed, during a series of time, both the kingdom and the priesthood together: but to give a detail of the succession.

Simon, otherwise called Psellus, was my great grandfather, who lived when Hyrcanus, the son of Simon, the high-priest, and the first of that name, had the pontificate. This Psellus had nine sons, one of whom was Matthias, surnamed Aphias, who, in the first year of king Hyrcanus, married the daughter of Jonathan, the high-priest. This Jonathan was the first of the sons of Almonæus. Matthias had a son, called Matthias Curtus, in the first year of the reign of Hyrcanus. His son's name was Joseph, born in the ninth year of the reign of Alexander; and from him descended Matthias, in the tenth year of Archelaus; to which Matthias I was born, in the first year of the reign of Caius Cæsar. I have three sons. Hyrcanus, the eldest, was born in the fourth year of Vespasian; Justus, the second, in the seventh; and Agrippa, the youngest, in the ninth. This is a short account of my extraction as it stands upon record, as an irrefragable testimony, in opposition to the authors of invidious and calumniating reports.

My father Matthias was greatly esteemed in Jerusalem; not only from his honourable descent, but his strict probity and justice. I had a brother, called after my father, with whom I was trained up in the different branches of literature. Being blessed with a sound judgment and retentive memory, I made so early a progress in my studies, that, at fourteen years of age, the high-priests and elders did me the honour of advising with me on some intricate points of law. At sixteen I began to inform myself of the different opinions of our three sects, the Pharisees, the Sadducees, and the Essenes, proposing to myself to investigate their respective tenets, and fix my choice where I most approved. I passed through them all with much labour and mortification; but supposing the experience I had attained from them insufficient to the end proposed, and hearing of one Banus, who led the life of an hermit in caves and solitudes, no covering but the bark of trees, fed upon nothing but the spontaneous productions of the earth, and bathed himself night and day in cold water to allay inordinate desires, I followed his example, and having passed three years with him in these austerities, and gratified my curiosity in the experiment, I returned to the city in my nineteenth year, and conformed myself to the sect of the Pharisees, whose principles much resemble those of the stoics among the Greeks.

In the six and twentieth year of my age I happened to go to Rome, on the following very particular occasion. Felix, being at that time governor of Judæa, had sent several priests, worthy men of my acquaintance, as prisoners to Rome, upon a very frivolous pretence, to clear themselves of what might be objected to them before Cæsar. They shewed the utmost constancy, chusing rather to suffer any thing than depart from their duty, which consideration induced me to determine, at all events, to attempt to procure their deliverance. Accordingly I embarked for Rome, and falling into a desperate storm, with about six hundred in company, we were cast away, and the vessel was lost in the Adriatic gulph. Only eighty of the whole number, by a wonderful Providence, were preserved, being taken up early the next morning by a vessel of Cyrene, when we had kept ourselves a whole night above water by swimming.

Having thus escaped and got to Dicearchia, (by the Italians called Puteoli,) I became acquainted with Alityrus, a comedian, by birth a Jew, and in great favour with the emperor Nero. This man brought me to the knowledge of the empress Poppæa, who who immediately, at my request, procured the priests their discharge, and loaded me with presents; after which I returned to my own country.

Upon my arrival I found affairs in a very precarious situation, and the people appeared disposed to a revolt; so that I endeavoured to keep the rebellious within the bounds of duty, by representing to them the circumstances of the enemy with whom they had to do, who were politic, martial, and well disciplined; that I could not but dissuade them from exposing their country, wives, and children, and all that could be dear to them, upon terms so very unequal. I plied them with argument, counsel, and importunity, to divert them from an outrage that could not but be attended with many fatal consequences. But whatever I laid before them had no effect, so great was the insatiation caused by their desperate condition. But persuaded that too often inculcating the lessons I gave them would draw upon me their hatred and suspicion, as if I sided with the enemy, which might in the end endanger my life, I took sanctuary in the inner temple, and, after Manahem, and the principal robbers, were put to death, betook myself to the priests and chief men of the Pharisees. We were presently in a panic at the people taking up arms; and when we were not able to restrain their fury, we pretended to approve the steps they had taken; but advised them to decline any hostilities, as we were in hopes that Gessius Florus would come to our assistance, with a sufficient body of forces to quell the sedition.

But upon his coming, and giving battle to the rebels, he had the ill fortune to be defeated, and several of his men were slain, which overthrow became the source of great calamities to our nation; for those that were disposed for war entertained hopes of finally conquering the Romans. Besides, another cause occurred for rekindling this war, which was as follows:

The Syrians and Jews living promiscuously together in several great towns bordering upon Judæa, the former took their opportunity of seizing upon all the Jews, with their wives and children, who dwelt among them, and inhumanly put them to death, without any sort of provocation or offence; for there was nothing of a conspiracy, or so much as disaffection to the Romans charged upon them. But the barbarity of the Scythopolitans exceeded all the rest; for they not only forced the Jews of the place, that were their fellow-citizens, to bear arms against those of their own tribe that came before it, (a thing expressly forbidden by our laws,) but when they had worsted the enemy by their assistance, without any regard to justice, gratitude, or common faith, put them all to the sword, without mercy or distinction, to the number of several thousands. The Jews of Damascus were treated much in the same manner, as is related at large in our history of the Jewish wars. We mention this circumstance in particular, in order to make it generally known that we did not undertake this war upon choice, but were forced upon it by extreme necessity.

After the overthrow of Gessius, the leading men of the Jews finding themselves weak and unarmed, and in danger of a turbulent and powerful faction, thought it time to provide for their own security; so that considering how Galilee was divided, they sent me, and two other priests, Joazar and Judas, as commissioners, to try if we could prevail with the seditious people to lay down their arms; not so as to part with them entirely, but only to deposit them, for the present, in the hands of their governors, till they should have occasion to use them, and wait till they were better informed what the Romans intended to do.

When I had received these instructions, I proceeded to Galilee, and found the people of Sepphoris very much agitated by a concern for their country, into which the Galileans had made inroads, on pretence of their standing up for the Romans, and their adherence to Sennius Gallus, then governor of Syria. But I effectually removed all their apprehensions, by obtaining for them a licence to send as often as they pleased to Dora, a city of Phœnicia, to their hostages they had given to Gessius. The citizens of Tiberias had taken arms on the following occasion.

There were three factions in this city. The first consisted of men of honour and integrity, and Julius Capellus was their chief; who was joined by Herod, the son of Marius; Herod, the son of Gamalus; and Complus, the son of Complus: but as for his brother Crispus, whom Agrippa had made governor of the town, he now lived upon his estate beyond Jordan. All these were urgent for the citizens continuing their allegiance to the king and the people of Rome; Pistus being the only man of rank who, in compliance with his son Justus, went the other way. The second faction was composed of rabble, and seemed determined for war. At the head of the third was the above-mentioned Justus, who pretended to have scruples with respect to the war, but still was desirous of innovation, from a view of advancing himself by means of the confusion.

To this end he endeavoured to persuade the people, "That this city had ever belonged to Galilee, and reputed in the days of Herod the tetrarch, its founder, the capital of the province: that this right of precedence was never so much as questioned from the time of Agrippa, the father, till the government of Felix, when he gave it away to the younger Agrippa: and that the people of Sepphoris, in line, never claimed any privilege above their neighbours, till they subjected themselves to the Roman yoke, and removing the records and treasure upon that revolution."

When Justus, by these means, had inflamed the people to a revolt, he told them in plain terms, "That, since the Sepphorites were so obstinately devoted to the interest of the Romans, they had no other means of vindicating their rights and liberties, than immediately to take up arms, and join with the Galileans in opposing the Sepphorites." This popular and plausible address wrought greatly upon the people. Besides, he was so well versed in the Greek tongue, as to write an account of these transactions, palliating and disguising matters as he found most conducive to his purpose. But I shall more particularly delineate the character of this Justus, and point out, in the progress of the narrative, how he and his brother had well nigh proved the destruction of our nation. When he had gained over some of the citizens by persuasion, and others by force, to take up arms, he marched out with them in a body, and set fire to the habitations of the Gadarenes and Hippenians, about Tiberias and Scythopolis.

To pass over from the state of Tiberias to that of Gischala. John, the son of Levi, finding several of his fellow-citizens highly impatient of the Roman yoke, endeavoured to keep them within the compass of good faith and obedience. But he could not gain his purpose; for the Gadarenes, Tyrians, and others, having joined their forces, attacked and took Gischala by storm, laid it in ashes, and then returned home. John was so exasperated at this outrage, that he collected his troops, marched, fought and defeated them. After that he rebuilt the place, and, for better security, encompassed it with a strong wall.

But the people of Gamala stood firm to the Romans from the following cause. Philip, the son of Jaconius, king Agrippa's lieutenant, having escaped out of Jerusalem while the enemy was before the palace, fell into another danger of being destroyed by Manahem, and his band of robbers, but was preserved by some of his Babylonish relations, who were then at Jerusalem. Upon the fifth day after his escape, he disguised himself by a cap of false hair, and thifted away till he came to a certain village of his own, near the castle of Gamala, where he sent orders to some of his subjects to come to him. In this place he was seized with a sudden fever, which providentially proved the occasion of saving his life; for, upon falling into this distemper, per, he wrote to Agrippa and Berenice, by a certain freeman of trust and credit, with orders to deliver his letter to Varus, to whom had been committed the care of the palace in their absence, on journey to Berytus, with an intention of meeting Gessius.

Varus, Agrippa's deputy, puts a messenger to death as an impostor.

Aspires to the kingdom.

When Varus found, by these letters, that Philip had made his escape, he was greatly concerned, lest the king and queen should discharge him from their service upon his return; so that he exposed the messenger to the people as an impostor; alledging that Philip was at that time at Jerusalem with the Jews, making war against the Romans; and upon this calumny he caused him to be put to death. When Philip had waited a considerable time, and received no news either of the messenger or the letters, he dispatched a second with another packet, to enquire what was become of the former; and he was taken off upon the same pretence. Now the Syrians of Cesarea had persuaded Varus that the Romans would certainly revenge themselves upon Agrippa for this rebellion of the Jews, and that, upon his death, the crown would devolve to him as a branch of the royal line, descending from Sohemus, the tetrarch of Libanus. Varus became so puffed up with this conceit, that he intercepted the king's letters, and guarded all the passes, in order to deprive him of intelligence of what was done. He put great numbers of the Jews to death, to make an interest with the Syrians of Cesarea; and likewise proposed engaging the Trachonites of Batanea with him in a war with the Jews in Ecbatana, which they call Babylonians.

The Jews inveigled, and cut to pieces.

In order to the prosecution of this design, he sent for twelve of the principal Jews in Cesarea, and dispatched them away in his name, with a message to their friends at Ecbatana, purporting, that Varus had heard of their entering into a conspiracy against their king, but that though he did not believe the report, he required them to lay down their arms, as the most demonstrative proof of their innocence. He also enjoined them to bring seventy of their principal men, to answer all objections in behalf of the rest. The twelve deputies accordingly went, and acquitted themselves of their commission; but, upon strict enquiry at Ecbatana, among people of their own tribe, not finding the least colour for any such rumour, they took, according to their instructions, seventy of the principal men along with them, and proceeded towards Cesarea. Varus, in the mean time, having planted himself in the passage with a guard of the king's troops about him, fell upon them, and cut all to pieces except one man; after which he advanced upon his design against the Jews at Ecbatana.

Philip goes to Gamala, and is tendered the assistance of the inhabitants against Varus.

Varus is removed, and succeeded by Equus Modius.

But, by a wonderful Providence, the only one of the seventy who escaped got thither before him, with the news of this abominable treachery; upon which the inhabitants put themselves in arms, and, with their wives and children, retired to the castle of Gamala, leaving their goods and cattle behind them to a mighty value. As soon as Philip heard of the adventure, he repaired thither, and was welcomed with universal acclamations of the people, who tendered him their lives and fortunes in a contest with Varus and his Cesarean abettors, if he would but do them the honour to command them; for it was now reported that the king was slain. Philip, however, endeavoured to restrain their zeal, by reminding them of the benefits the king had conferred upon them, the formidable power of the Romans, and the desperate hazard of a rebellion, inasmuch that they were brought in the conclusion to better reason. When the king had intelligence of the resolution of Varus, with respect to the massacre of all the Jews in Cesarea, he removed him from his government, and appointed Equus Modius to succeed him, Philip keeping possession of the citadel of Gamala, and the country bordering upon it, that continued their allegiance to the Romans.

When I came into Galilee, and received the news of these transactions, I wrote to the Sanhedrim at Jerusalem respecting every circumstance, and requesting their commands as to my future proceedings. Their instructions were for me to remain where I was, and provide the best I could for the defence and security of the place, and to retain my colleagues if they approved it. But having acquired great riches from the tythes which were due to them as priests, they resolved to return; but, at my request, staid a little longer, till matters were better accommodated. We went together from Sephoris to Bethmaus, about four furlongs distant from Tiberias, whither sending a messenger, I summoned the elders of the people to appear before me. Upon their arrival, (and Justus among the rest,) I told them I was sent to them by the people of Jerusalem, together with my colleagues, to confer with them about the demolition of the palace which Herod, the tetrarch, had erected there, and adorned with the images of divers animals, in direct violation of our laws, and requested them to put that work into immediate execution. Capellus, and the rest of his faction, opposed it a long time; but at length, after a hard contest, we carried the point.

While this controversy was on the tapis, Jesus, the son of Sapphias, instigated an abandoned banditti to set fire to the palace royal, in expectation of considerable booty; for every thing he saw was magnificent and sumptuous; so that they pillaged many things, notwithstanding our utmost precaution. Having transacted our business with the people of Tiberias, we withdrew from Bethmaus into the Upper Galilee: but the faction of Jesus put all the Greeks in Tiberias to the sword, and all whom they deemed enemies before these hostilities.

When I had intelligence of these proceedings, I was much enraged, went down to Tiberias, and used all the care and diligence possible to save the household furniture of the palace from the hands of the pillagers. Among these were candlesticks of Corinthian bras, royal tables, and a great quantity of silver in the mass. Resolved to preserve whatever I saved for the king's use, I sent for ten of the principal men in the senate, and Capellus, the son of Antilus, and delivered to them the respective articles, with an express charge not to part with them to any one without my particular order.

From thence I proceeded with my colleagues to Gischala, to watch the motions of John, whom we found manifestly engaged in forming a party, and setting up for himself. He importuned me to give him authority to export the corn that belonged to the emperor, who had several magazines in the Upper Galilee. Perceiving the drift of his intention in this request, I assured him that I could not possibly permit him; as being obliged, by virtue of my commission from Jerusalem, to take care of all things within that jurisdiction, I could not dispose of such stores any other way than for the service of Cæsar, or the good of the province. Finding he could not prevail with me, he applied himself to my colleagues, who, through want of foresight, and the prevalence of avarice, were induced, by bribes and fair words, to comply with his request; so that having a majority of votes on his side, it was carried against me. John had no sooner gained this point, than he bethought himself of another invention.

The inhabitants of Cesarea Philippi were complaining to him (he said) for want of pure virgin oil, and desired him to supply them; the Grecian oil being forbidden them, and the king's prohibition barring them from going out of town to fetch it. John was evidently actuated herein by interest, not religion; for he knew that this oil bore forty times the price at Gischala that it did at Cesarea; so that he sent away the whole stock from one place to the other, under colour of authority from me, which, indeed, I did not grant him voluntarily, but from apprehension, had I refused, of being stoned by the multitude. John, in the end, gained vast sums of money by this stratagem.

Having sent my colleagues from Gischala to Jerusalem, I made it my entire business to arm, fortify, and, in short, provide the best I could for the defence of my province. The free-booters I found were were not to be reduced by force, and therefore tried the effect of composition; so that a treaty was entered into with several leading men among them to take them into pay, being all convinced that the charge of the pension would not be comparable to the spoil they would make by rapine and pillage. We came, in fine, to an agreement; and I took their oaths for the performance of articles, and so dismissed them. The conditions were these; that they should not offer any violence either to Romans or natives, nor ever set foot into our country but when they were called, or behind hand in their pay. For it was my principal concern to keep Galilee in peace, in order to which I made choice of seventy of their best men to go along with me, and made use of them as companions, counsellors, and assistants, and, with their approbation, pronounced my sentences, but with an inviolate regard to integrity and justice; so that, under the appearance of friends, they served me in quality of hostages.

I was now in the thirtieth year of my life, an age wherein the utmost virtue and precaution cannot secure a man from the lash of envy and detraction, especially in an exalted situation. Yet I can undertake to aver that I never was charged with any capital misdemeanour. I wanted nothing; I coveted nothing; nay, I refused my very tenths, though due to me as a priest, even when offered. I confess I took part of the spoils upon the defeat I gave the Syrians, and sent them to my kindred at Jerusalem. But when I had twice stormed Sepphoris, four times Tiberias, once Gadara, and several times brought John, who treacherously acted against me, into my power, I passed all over without taking revenge either of one or the other; and the Omniscient Being, to whom the secrets of the heart are open, was so gracious as to deliver me from the snares of professed enemies; and not upon that occasion only, but divers times afterwards, as will be seen in the sequel.

Such was the regard and benevolence of the people of Galilee towards me, that, when their cities were taken by assault, and their wives and children carried into slavery, they had a much greater concern for my sufferings than their own. This excited the envy of John, who, in a letter, requested me, when he came to Tiberias, to grant him permission to use the hot baths there for the recovery of his health. I immediately complied, having no suspicion of any wicked design, and gave him commendatory letters to those to whom I had committed the administration of the affairs of Tiberias, to provide necessary accommodations for him and his whole train. At this time I took up my abode in a certain village of Galilee, called Jana.

John was no sooner come to Tiberias, than he tampered with the inhabitants to revolt from their fidelity to me, and come over to his interest. Several were won over by his entreaties, being fond of innovation, and glad of any opportunity that offered to promote their seditious views. Amongst his principal adherents were Justus, and his father Pistus, who immediately closed with the proposition, and joined interests with John against me. But, by good foresight, I prevented their design: for Silas, whom I had made governor of Tiberias, sent me a messenger to inform me of the disposition of the inhabitants, and advised me to hasten thither, as the only means of preventing the city's coming under the jurisdiction of another. Upon the receipt of this intelligence, I took two hundred men with me, and travelled all night, having sent a messenger before me to inform the inhabitants of my approach. In the morning a great multitude came out to meet me, and amongst them John, whose countenance betrayed his guilt. Being conscious that his life was at stake, if he was discovered, he hastily withdrew to his apartment. When I had reached the place for public exercises, I dismissed the guards I had about me, excepting one, and ten armed men that were with him, and then addressed the people of Tiberias from an eminence, upon the subject of good faith and allegiance, the honour of a generous constancy, and the dangerous consequences, as well as actual baseness, of betraying a trust; for one treachery would most certainly be avenged upon the head of the traitor by another, and after one act of perfidy their credit would be lost for ever.

I had scarcely uttered these words, when I heard a voice earnestly calling to me to come down and provide for my own security, as my enemies were just upon me, and this was no time for speeches. The truth was that John, having me at advantage in a place where I was little better than alone, drew a select number of men out of the thousand that he commanded, with orders to fall upon me by surprise. They were already advanced within a little of executing their design, which they had certainly done, if I had not leaped down that very moment by the help of one of my own guards, who led me off to the lake, where I found a vessel that conveyed me to Taricheæ, beyond all expectation, and out of the power of my enemies.

The inhabitants of this city, when they came to hear of the perfidious conduct of the Tiberians, were greatly exasperated, betook themselves to their arms, and requested me to head them, that they might avenge the cause of their commander. The report of this outrage was quickly spread all over Galilee, in order to irritate the Galileans, who presently assembled in prodigious numbers, and with great earnestness entreated me to assault Tiberias, and upon the taking of it, utterly demolish it, and expose the inhabitants, with their whole families, to sale for slaves. Those of my friends, who had escaped out of Tiberias, gave me the same advice. But I did not comply with it, dreading the thoughts of being the cause of a civil war, and being desirous of putting a stop to the dispute before they proceeded to blows. I also pointed out to them, that it was not their interest to pursue such measures, as a spectacle for the Romans that were to stand looking on. By these means, though with much difficulty, I assuaged the impetuous rage of the Galileans.

But John, when he found his stratagem disconcerted, began to have apprehensions for himself; so that taking the forces he had about him, he quitted Tiberias, and went to Gischala, whence he wrote a letter in excuse for what he had done, as if he had acted against his inclination, and begged of me to entertain no suspicion of him, ratifying the same with dreadful execrations, in order to obtain credit to what he had declared.

This, however, did not satisfy the Galileans, who were too well acquainted with his perfidy in divers instances, so that they pressed me still (being a mighty body of men) to lead them on to the assault, that they might destroy him, and Gischala, the place of his nativity, at once. I gratefully acknowledged my obligations to them for the respect and goodwill they had shewn me, and assured them of the best services I could render them in requital; but, at the same time, importuned them to restrain the impetuosity of their rage, and permit me to endeavour to put an end to the tumult without bloodshed. When I had prevailed with the multitude, I withdrew to Sepphoris.

The inhabitants of this city (determined to continue in their allegiance to the Romans) were not without apprehensions upon my approach, and so contrived for their own security how they might divert me some other way. With this view they sent a messenger to Jesus, the head of the robbers, upon the borders of Ptolemais, with promise of a large reward, if he would bring his company, amounting to 800 men, and make war upon us. The temptation prevailed, and it was resolved to fall upon us by surprise. In consequence of this, Jesus sent me word by a messenger, that he was desirous of making me a visit. When I granted his request, having no suspicion of his treacherous design, he took a band of his robbers, and set out on his journey with all expedition. But his intention was frustrated; for, upon his approach within a little of the town, I had intelligence brought me by a deserter of the whole contrivance.

Upon this information I went into the marketplace, place, as if ignorant of the plot against me, and was there attended by a numerous train of Galileans in arms, and several Tiberians amongst them. I then gave orders for the guard of the passes, and the centinels at the gates, to let in only Jesus himself, with some few of his followers, and exclude the rest; or, if they should attempt to break in by violence, to repel them by force. They did as they were ordered, and admitted Jesus with some few of his train, and then shut the gates against the rest. Upon his entrance, I commanded him to lay down his arms upon pain of death in case of refusal, with which he complied, finding himself surrounded with a guard of soldiers. Those of his followers, who were excluded the city, when they heard their leader was taken, betook themselves to a precipitate flight.

Generosity of Josephus to John, and to the Sepphorites

After this I took Jesus aside, and told him I was not ignorant of the plot designed against me, nor by whom he was sent: however, I would grant him pardon after all these provocations, if he would promise, in future, to behave as a faithful subject. He accordingly pledged himself, in the most solemn manner, so to do; upon which I set him at liberty, and allowed him to collect the men he had brought with him. With respect to the Sepphorites, I charged them to be quiet and peaceable in future at their peril.

Josephus is for toleration in religion.

There came to me, about this time, out of the country of the Trachonites, two grandees, who had been vested with legal authority, bringing with them horses, arms, and money. The Jews were absolutely against receiving them, unless they would submit to the rite of circumcision: but I would not suffer any violence of that kind to be offered them, observing, that "every man ought to be at liberty to worship God according to his own conscience; and that these men, who had fled to us for protection, ought not to be so treated as to repent of their coming hither." When I had pacified the multitude, I furnished the men, that came over to us, with all necessities in abundance.

Ebertius, having engaged Josephus, retires.

During these transactions, king Agrippa sent Equus Modius, with a body of forces, to lay siege to the castle of Gamala. The detachment being too few to invest the place, they could only post guards at the avenues, in order to block it up. But when Ebertius, the centurion, who had command of the great plain, understood that I was come to Simonias, a village upon the confines of Galilee, distant about sixty furlongs, he drew up an hundred horse, that he had then about him, near two hundred foot, and some military troops from Gaba, and making one night's march, reached the village. Having drawn up my forces in order of battle, he endeavoured to bring me into the plain, as his main confidence was in the cavalry. But as my army consisted principally of foot, I found it would not be safe to venture myself on that odds of ground, and so kept my station. Ebertius did what he could to force me from my post, which, when he found he could not effect by means of his horse, he quitted his design, and withdrew to Gaba, having lost only three men in the action. I followed him immediately with a body of two thousand men; and when I came to Besara, a town upon the confines of Ptolemæis, about twenty furlongs distant from Gaba, where Ebertius was at that time, I took possession of all the passes about it to secure my quarters, and, in the mean time, carried off the wheat, and other grain to a prodigious quantity, that had been taken from the neighbouring villages, and belonged to queen Berenice, sister to king Agrippa. This provision I caused to be transported to Galilee, upon a number of camels I had brought thither on purpose. When this business was finished, I offered Ebertius battle, which, when he declined, I bent my course towards Neopolitanus, who was then in garrison with a body of horse at Scythopolis, and committed ravages in the country about Tiberias; so that having delivered this place from further annoyance, I determined to attend to the affairs of Galilee.

Josephus is provident in supplying Galilee with provisions.

During these transactions John, the son of Levi, who was, as before observed, at Gischala, being galled to the very soul at hearing every thing succeeded to my wish, and that I was effectually established in the good opinion of my people, and at the same time a terror to my enemies, tampered with the inhabitants of Tiberias and Sepphoris, as well as those of Gaba, to revolt from their obedience to me, and join his party; insinuating to them how much easier their condition would be under his government than they found it under mine. The Sepphorites were, in truth, neither for one or the other of us, being wholly attached to the Romans. The Tiberians, though they would not be persuaded to revolt, promised to hold an amicable correspondence with him. But the Gabarenes espoused his interest at the importunity of Samois, a citizen of eminence, one of John's particular friends and companions. These people did not at first openly discover their defection, having apprehensions of the Galileans, whose kindness and loyalty to me they had several times experienced; but when they found a fit opportunity, they threw off the mask, and plainly shewed their treachery; in consequence of which I was exposed to imminent danger on the following account.

Solicitation of John to join against him

Their intention to join themselves to John

The wife of Ptolemy robbed by the Dabaretans

Josephus causes the booty to be restored

A plot to depose Josephus

Jesus the son of Sapphias, the head of the faction

A company of adventurous young men, of the village of Dabaretta, observing the wife of Ptolemy, the king's procurator, travelling with a pompous retinue over the great plain, out of the king's jurisdiction into a province of the Romans, suddenly sallied out upon them, forced the woman to fly, and plundered all the carriages. This passed while I was at Taricheæ, whither they brought four mules laden with rich clothes, costly furniture, a great number of silver vessels, and five hundred pieces of gold. Being desirous of preserving the property of Ptolemy, who was of my own tribe, (and our law prohibiting us from robbing even an enemy,) I told the people, who brought them to me, that they were by all means to be kept till they could be sold to the best advantage, and the money to be laid out upon repairing the walls of Jerusalem. These adventurers, regretting the loss of so considerable a booty, of which they had made themselves sure, spread a report throughout the country adjoining to Tiberias, that I had a design to betray the province to the Romans. I pretended, indeed, they said, to employ the profit of the purchase upon rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem, but that my real design was to restore it to the proprietor. Nor were they much mistaken; for, after their departure, I sent for Daphnus and Jannæus, two citizens of the first rank, and both in great esteem with the king, and ordered them to take the effects that had been stolen, and see them conveyed to the king, threatening them with death if they communicated the affair to any one else.

A rumour now spreading throughout Galilee, that the country was to be betrayed by me into the hands of the Romans, put every thing into confusion, and so exasperated the populace, that they vowed revenge. The people of Taricheæ, among others, gave so much credit to the story, that they tampered with my guards, and other soldiers, to abandon me when asleep, and withdraw immediately into the circus, there to consult with the rest what measures were to be taken against their general. When they came thither, they found a great concourse of people assembled beforehand, calling out, with one voice, for justice upon the traitor: but the ring-leader of the tumult was Jesus, the son of Sapphias, at this time chief magistrate of Tiberias, a man seditious, turbulent, and naturally disposed to innovation. Presenting himself to the multitude, with the two tables of Moses in his hand, he thus addressed them: "If, citizens, you have no regard for your own interest and safety, let me recommend to you, however, to preserve a reverence for these holy laws, which Josephus, your governor, has made no scruple to betray, and consequently rendered himself so odious to all good men, that no punishment can be too exemplary and severe."

The multitude applauded this address with the loudest acclamations; upon which he took a band of armed men, and hastened to the place where I resided, resided, with full determination to take away my life, while I was reposing myself without the least apprehension of danger. But Simon, my bodyguard, and the only man who now attended me, upon sight of the crowd pressing, roused me, told me the danger I was in, and advised me rather to fall by my own hand, than be insulted at the will and pleasure of an insolent enemy. I therefore committed myself to Providence, disguised myself in black, girded on my sword, and went through a bye way, where I supposed none of my adversaries would meet me, into the circus. I there threw myself prostrate on the earth, and exhibited so mournful a spectacle as excited general compassion. When I found the people in some measure softened, I endeavoured to influence their opinion in my favour before the return of the soldiers from the place of my residence. I admitted the truth of what had been objected to me, but requested them to permit me to inform them in what manner I had disposed of the money which arose from the plunder, when I assured them, I would cheerfully submit to death if it was their pleasure.

The people were for hearing me; but the soldiers, who were just returned, were for putting me to instant death. Through the clamour, however, that prevailed, they respited the execution, taking for granted that, after the confession of the treason, they should have just ground for taking away my life. Upon this, silence being proclaimed, I thus briefly addressed them :

"I am ready to die, my countrymen, if I shall be found to deserve it, provided I may lay before you a true state of the case for which I suffer before I go. I have ever looked upon this city as a sanctuary to strangers; inasmuch, that numbers of people have been prevailed upon to quit their native soil, and transplanted themselves hither to share with you their fortunes. What is my crime, but the dedicating a sum of money, from a zeal for the public service, towards the repairing of your walls? This, in short, is the ground of your displeasure."

The Taricheans, and other strangers, exhorted me to be of good courage; but the Galileans and Tiberians, on the other hand, were untractable and outrageous; so that it came to a direct feud between them; the one side plying me with menaces and hard words, the other undertaking for my security and protection. When I had promised to build walls at Tiberias, and other cities, they dropped the contest, took my word for the performance, and dispersed; after which unexpected deliverance I returned home, attended by my friends, and a guard of twenty soldiers.

But the heads of the sedition, apprehensive of being called to account for what they had done, collected about 600 soldiers, and came to my abode in order to set it on fire. When I heard of their approach, I thought it dishonourable to turn my back, and resolved to expose myself valiantly to the danger that threatened me. In order to this I gave orders for the doors to be shut, went into an upper apartment, and required them to send a party to receive the money, as the most effectual means of appeasing the tumult. Upon their sending one of the boldest of them all, I ordered him to be seized, severely scourged, one of his hands to be cut off, suspended about his neck, and thus turned out to tell his tale to those that sent him. At this procedure they were in no small consternation, from apprehension that I had a strong guard in my house, inasmuch, that they scoured off for fear of being treated in the same manner; and thus, through this stratagem, I escaped a conspiracy formed against me.

Notwithstanding this there was still some that irritated the multitude against me, and remonstrated, that the grandees, who fled to me for refuge, were unworthy to live, because they refused to conform themselves to the rites and customs of those with whom they lived for the sake of their own security. They traduced them with being forcerers, and advising the Romans to come against them; so that the multitude were deluded by such plausible pretences as were agreeable to their own inclinations. Upon information of this, I represented to them, that it was neither generous or discreet to persecute those that sought refuge amongst them; and ridiculed the charge they had brought against them of sorcery; alledging, that the Romans would never be at the expence of maintaining so many thousand soldiers, if they could overcome their enemies by dint of spells and witchcraft.

This, for the present, pacified them; but they were soon stirred up again, through the insinuations of some contentious persons, against the grandees; and a party of them, armed, went to their residence at Taricheæ, in order to put them to death. When I heard this, I collected what men I could, and posted away to prevent the mischief; for the sufferance of so barbarous an inhumanity would have rendered me odious to mankind. Upon my arrival, I locked the doors of the house, and had a trench drawn round it leading to the lake; sent for a vessel, embarked with them, and sailed to the confines of Hippos, where I gave them money to provide themselves with horses, and then dismissed them, with earnest advice to sustain their misfortunes with courage and resolution. I was extremely concerned that I was compelled to expose those that had fled to me to go again into an enemy's country; yet I thought it more eligible that they should perish by the hands of the Romans, than lose their lives by treachery within my jurisdiction. However, they escaped at length, and king Agrippa frankly pardoned them: and thus ended these commotions.

The people of Tiberias having offered, by letter, their service to king Agrippa, provided he would furnish them with troops sufficient to protect them, I went amongst them; and, upon my arrival, they reminded me of my promise of rebuilding their walls, as I had done those of Taricheæ. I immediately consented, and gave orders for providing materials, and workmen to put it in hand without delay. After three day's stay there, as I was travelling to Taricheæ, some thirty furlongs distant, it happened that certain Roman troops, being on their march within sight of Tiberias, the inhabitants took them to be of Agrippa's party, and suddenly burst into acclamations of the king, and most contemptuous reflections upon me. I soon received information from a messenger, in great haste, that the people were upon the very point of revolt; an event that embarrassed me much; for the sabbath being now at hand, I had dismissed the soldiers from Taricheæ, for the more quiet celebration of the festival. Beside, I seldom kept a guard about me in that place, as I had received divers proofs of the good affection of the people; so that having only seven soldiers, and some few friends about me, I found myself in great perplexity what course to take. It would have been to no purpose to recall my troops now the day was far spent, and I could make no use at all of the next ensuing. Then had I given liberty to the people of Taricheæ to plunder the city, their number was not sufficient for that purpose. Nor was there time for consideration or delay, as forces were hourly expected from the king, who would seize upon the town, and exclude me. These concurring reflections induced me to try the effect of a stratagem. I set over the gates of the town some persons in whom I could confide, with orders to be particularly diligent in observing those who wanted to go out, and summoned the heads of the chief families to come to me, every one of whom I enjoined to go on board some vessel, which I had provided for that purpose, having also procured pilots, and then charged them to follow me to Tiberias. This done, I embarked with my friends, and the seven soldiers, and sailed for the same place.

When the Tiberians perceived their mistake, and that no forces came from the king to their assistance, and saw the lake covered with vessels, they began to be apprehensive for the safety of their city, and presently changed their former opinion. They threw down their arms, came out to meet me with their wives and children, with the utmost submission congratulated me on my arrival, wished me success in my undertakings, and invited me into their city, imagining I was wholly ignorant of their former design. Upon drawing near the shore, I ordered the pilots to cast anchor a little farther off the land, that the people might not discern our vessels were empty. When I approached them, (being conveyed in a certain vessel,) I upbraided them with their folly, in relinquishing their allegiance without any reasonable cause. However, I assured them of forgiveness of what was past, provided they would send me ten of their ringleaders, with which they complied; and I immediately ordered them away for Taricheæ, there to be kept in custody.

Josephus sends the leading men of Tiberias in custody to Taricheæ

Adjudges Clytus, a principal incendiary, to the loss of his hand

By this stratagem I gradually got the whole senate of Tiberias, and many of their principal citizens, into my power, whom I sent to the beforementioned city. The multitude, reflecting upon the condition they were in, imputed the whole cause to one Clytus, a hardy, resolute adventurer, as a desperate incendiary, and requested that I would bring him to condign punishment. As I could not in conscience put a man of my own tribe to death, and yet was under an absolute necessity of making him an example by some means or other, I ordered Levi, belonging to my body guards, to cut off one of his hands. But the soldier, fearing to execute this order among so numerous a multitude, and I, being desirous of veiling his timidity, thus exclaimed: "Since you deserve to lose both hands, be your own executioner, lest, on refusal, you expose yourself to a severer punishment." Upon his earnest petition to spare one of his arms, I granted him that boon, when he immediately took a sword, and cut off his own left hand; and this put an end to the tumult.

Lenity of Josephus to the prisoners at Taricheæ.

When the people of Tiberias, after I was gone to Taricheæ, perceived the stratagem I had put in execution, they were astonished to think I had terminated the sedition without effusion of blood. Matters being thus quiet, having ordered some of the prisoners to be released, amongst whom was Justus, and his father Pistus, I invited them to an entertainment, and took that opportunity of observing, that I was not ignorant of the superiority of the Roman power, though I confessed to have dissembled in that instance, because of the faction with which I had to contend. I endeavoured to bring them to the same opinion, and induce them, in the mean time, to live quietly under my administration, as they would never find a governor of more lenity than myself. I reminded Justus of the Galileans cutting off the hands of his brother before I left Jerusalem, upon a pretence of forging some letters; and of the Gamalites, upon a dispute they had with the Babylonians after Philip's departure, putting his kinsman Chares to death; whereas I had not treated his brother-in-law Jesus in that barbarous manner. Having communicated these particulars at table, I gave orders for Justus, and all his followers, to be set at liberty early the next morning.

A little before this Philip, the son of Jacimus, went out of the citadel of Gamala upon the following occasion. When Philip was informed that Varus was put out of his government by king Agrippa, and Modius Equus, his old friend and companion, succeeded him, he wrote him a letter, acquainting him with every circumstance that had befallen him, and requesting him to take care that the enclosed were forwarded to the king and queen, who were then at Berytus. Modius was overjoyed to hear of the welfare of his friend, and dispatched the letters according to address.

Agrippa sends for Philip to court, and gives him honourable commissions

As soon as the king perceived these letters, and found that the report of Philip's putting himself at the head of the Jews against the Romans was false, he sent for him to court by a party of horse, and receiving him, on his arrival, with great cordiality, told his commanders about him, that that was the person they heard had revolted from the Romans. He sent him soon after this with some troops of horse to the fort of Gamala, with instructions to bring away all his family, resettle the Babylonians in Batanea, and take all possible care to keep the people quiet. Philip had no sooner received his orders, than he hastened to execute his commission.

About this time one Joseph, the son of a mountebank, having, by his insinuations, induced several adventurers, young men, to espouse his interest, made an insurrection upon the inhabitants of Gamala, and then advised them to renounce their allegiance to the king, and take up arms, as the only means of recovering their liberty. Some were compelled to enter into their measures, and those who would not acquiesce were slain. Chares fell a sacrifice to their fury, as did his kinsman Jesus, with the brethren of Justus of Tiberias, whom we have already mentioned. The inhabitants wrote to me, desiring I would send them troops for a garrison, and workmen to build their walls; with both which requests I immediately complied.

This procedure was followed by a revolt of the country of the Gaulanites, as far as the town of Solyma, from the king. I built a wall about Sogannis and Seleucia, two very strong places by situation, and fortified several towns in the Upper Galilee, as Jamnia, Amerthya, and Charabe, among the rocky mountains; and in the Lower Galilee the towns of Taricheæ, Tiberias, and Sepphoris; together with the villages of the Cave of Arbela, Bersobe, Selame, Jotapata, and the mount Itabyr, in which places I had my magazines of corn and arms.

This prosperous course of my affairs excited such envy in the breast of John, the son of Levi, that he formed a resolution of accomplishing my destruction. To that end, having wallled in Gischala, the place of his nativity, he sent his brother Simon, the son of Gamaliel, at Jerusalem, to request him to use his interest with the sanhedrim to remove me from my government, and appoint John as my successor. This Simon was a citizen of the first rank, by sect a Pharisee, who were supposed to excel others in accurate knowledge of the laws of their country. He was also a man of eminent political talents, and admirably adapted to regulate affairs of state. Add to this, he was warmly attached to the interest of John, and sanguinely averse to me.

In consequence, therefore, of this application from John, he advised Ananus, the high-priest, and Jesus, the son of Gamala, with others of the party, to stop my progress now I was raising myself to dignity, nor suffer me to arrive at the highest pitch of grandeur; it being their common interest to remove me from the government of Galilee. He pointed out the necessity of being expeditious in effecting such a design, lest I should gain intelligence of it, and invade the city with a numerous army. This was the counsel of Simon. But Ananus observed to them, that this was not to be effected so easily as had been suggested; because many of the high-priests, and heads of the people, could bear witness to the integrity of my administration; and observed, that it would not appear reasonable to proceed to a judgment upon any man without assigning his crime.

Simon, after hearing this from Ananus, desired that the matter might rest, and that what had passed between them might not reach the knowledge of the people, as he would make it his business to effect my removal in another way. Upon this he applied himself to the brother of John, and proposed the distribution of money and presents among the friends of Ananus, as the most likely course he could take for gaining his point. By this method Simon compassed his end; for Ananus and his companions, on receiving these bribes, concerted the means for deposing me from my government, without admitting one citizen to be privy to the matter.

With this view they concluded it most expedient to send into Galilee some persons who were eminent for their birth, and versed equally with me in the laws. Two of these happened to be laics, who were Jonathan and Ananias, and of the sect of the Pharisees; the third was Jozar, descended from the sacerdotal line, and also a Pharisee; but the fourth, who who was Simon, was the chief of the priests. These four had instructions, when they came before the assembly of the Galileans, to enquire into the cause of their partiality to me. If it was said, because I was born at Jerusalem, it might be answered, so were they: if because I was versed in the laws, it might be answered, they were not ignorant of the constitution of their country: but if they proceeded to say, that they respected me for the dignity of the priesthood, they should reply, that two of their members were priests.

When Jonathan and his companions had received these instructions, they were presented with 40,000 drachmæ, out of the public money, to defray their expences: but hearing after that a certain Galilean, named Jesus, was come to Jerusalem with a band of six hundred men, they sent for him, and presenting him with three months pay beforehand, ordered him to follow Jonathan and his colleagues, and pay obedience to their commands. They moreover gave money to the three hundred citizens to defray their charges in general. These necessary preparations being made, Jonathan and his associates set forward, having in their retinue the brother of John, and the hundred soldiers, who were ordered by those that sent them, on condition I voluntarily laid down my arms, to take me prisoner, and send me to Jerusalem; but, upon any opposition, they were to put me to death without scruple, relying entirely on the command that had been given them. There were letters also dispatched away to John to be in readiness to make war upon me: and the Sepphorites, the Gabareens, and the Tiberians, were commanded to assist him with supplies.

Now Jesus, the son of Gamala, who was attached to me, and privy to the whole contrivance, sent my father word, from time to time, of every thing that passed, and from him I received a particular account of the whole matter. I was much troubled to think of the ingratitude and malicious practices of a faction in the city against me; nor was I less afflicted to find the trouble my father was in for my sake, and with what earnestness he pressed me to come over to him, that he might see me yet once again before he departed this life. Hereupon I made these particulars known to my friends, and informed them, that, in three days, I should leave the country, and visit the place of my birth. They were much concerned at hearing the same, and entreated me, with tears in their eyes, not to leave them, as they should certainly fall to ruin if they wanted my government. But finding all their entreaties ineffectual, the Galileans, apprehending my departure would render them more contemptible to the robbers, sent messengers throughout the whole province to notify the same. This giving an alarm, brought great numbers of people, together with their wives and children, to the plain of Asochis, where I then was, to prevail with me to stay; not so much out of affection to me, perhaps, as their own fears and apprehensions; for they thought themselves secure as long as I remained with them.

That very night I had a surprizing dream: for having withdrawn to bed, full of sorrow and confusion from the contents of the letter which I received, it seemed that a person stood by me, and addressed me to this purport: "O thou, who art so sad, banish thy sorrow, and discharge thy fears; for all these calamities tend only to thy greater advantage and satisfaction; not only for the present, but likewise for the time to come; wherefore stand firm, and remember you were told, that you must wage war with the Romans."

Upon waking out of this dream, I arose with a design to go out into the plain. When the whole multitude of the Galileans, men, women, and children, saw me, they cast themselves prostrate, and, with tears and supplications, besought me not to leave them in this extremity, at the mercy of their enemies. When they found prayers would not avail, they pressed me with adjurations not to forsake them, and that with many heavy curse upon the people of Jerusalem, that would never let them be quiet.

When I heard these words, and saw the sorrow of the multitude, I was melted down to pity and compassion, and brought, in the end, to a resolution of running any hazard whatever for their service. I now commanded them to draw me 5000 men out of their whole number, and furnish them with arms and provisions for a march, and sent away the rest to their respective habitations. As soon as these five thousand were ready, I joined them with three thousand more, and advanced with them to the town of Chabolo, on the frontiers of Ptolemais, where I took up my station, as if my design had been to fall upon Placidus, whom Cestius Gallus had sent into those parts, with a troop of horse and two companies, to burn all the villages in that quarter. Both armies were several times drawn out with a design of coming to action, but proceeded no farther than to slight skirmishes; for the more I pressed the bringing of it to a combat, the more the other declined it; yet did he not draw off from the neighbourhood of Ptolemais.

While matters were in this posture, Jonathan, with his colleagues, appeared, who had been sent from Jerusalem by the faction of Simon, and Ananus, the priest. At first they endeavoured to take me by stratagem, not having the resolution to attack me openly. To this end they consulted together, and sent me the following letter.

Jonathan, and his colleagues, from the Sanhedrim at Jerusalem, to Josephus, greeting:

"Whereas the elders are given to understand, that John of Gischala hath been engaged in several perfidious practices against your person, they have sent me, in their names, to give him a severe reproof for so doing, and to require him, for the future, to pay all respect and obedience to your commands. And to the end that we may agree upon some better provision for the regulation of things hereafter, we make it our request that you will come hither to us with all speed. As the village is but small, we desire you will not bring any considerable retinue, as there is not convenience to accommodate a numerous train."

Jonathan's letter to Josephus.

This letter put me to the pause; for it occurred to me, that, if I went unguarded, they might seize my person, and treat me as they pleased; and, on the other hand, if I was attended with military force, it might serve as a pretext for condemning me as an enemy. The letter was brought me by an officer of horse, an intrepid youth, who had been formerly in the king's service. The evening was advanced, and being regaling with some friends, and several Galileans of rank, about me, word was brought me at table, that a Jew horseman desired to speak with me. Having ordered him to be introduced, he entered, and, without any deference to the company, delivered me a letter, which he brought, he said, from the Jerusalem deputies, and required an immediate answer, as he was to return without delay. The company were amazed at the confidence of the soldier, whom I desired to sit down, and partake of the conviviality, keeping the letter in my hand without opening it. Though he excused himself from accepting the invitation, I took care to protract the time, by introducing various subjects of discourse, and passing now and then out at the door, in complimentary attendance on some of my guests that were going to repose, availed myself of that opportunity for breaking open the letter, and glancing at the contents; then instantly folding it up, I held it still in my hand as before, without discovering that I had read it. All the company at length retired, but four particular friends, when I presented the soldier with twenty drachmæ as a gratuity. From the warmth of his acknowledgment, I found that money was his object; and resolving to attack him on his weak side, I promised, if he would sit down and be chearful, for every cup he took he should be gratified with a drachmæ. He caught the bait, and becoming speedily intoxicated, unravelled the whole mystery mystery of the plot laid to take away my life. Upon this discovery I gave him the following answer to his letter.

Josephus to Jonathan, and his colleagues in embassy, greeting :

Answer of Josephus to Jonathan.

" I rejoice to hear of your health and arrival in Galilee, as I can now return to my native country; this being a fair opportunity for my delivering up the care of the public administration into your hands. I should esteem myself happy in attending you at Xallo, or farther, without invitation, but am under a necessity of remaining where I am to watch the motions of Placidus, who has a design of breaking into Galilee. I therefore think it more adviseable, upon receipt of this letter, for you to come hither." Farewell.

This letter I delivered to the horseman, and sent with him thirty trusty Galileans, with orders to compliment the deputies on my part, but to proceed no farther. I joined to each of them a soldier in whom I could confide, to watch their motions, and observe that they did not combine, or enter into any schemes, against me with Jonathan and his colleagues. After their departure, the deputies, finding their first essay abortive, sent a letter to the following effect.

Jonathan and colleagues to Josephus greeting :

A peremptory summons to Josephus to appear at Gabara.

" This is to require you to appear within three days before us at the village of Gabara, without any guard, to make good the charges you have exhibited against John of Gischala."

The people one and all for Josephus.

When they had written this letter, and saluted the Galileans whom I sent, they went to Japha, one of the strongest and most populous villages of Galilee. Upon their approach, the inhabitants, with their wives and children, went out to meet them, and, with uplifted voices, called upon them to depart, nor interrupt their tranquillity; for they would own no other governor than Josephus. The deputies, after this disappointment here, withdrew to Sepphoris, the largest city of all Galilee. The inhabitants of this place, being in the Roman interest, went out to meet them; but said not a word either in my commendation or dispraise. From thence they proceeded to Asochis, where they met with the same reception as they had done at Japha. This contemptuous treatment rendered them so outrageous, that they ordered their soldiers to quiet the clamours of the multitude with clubs and cudgels. Upon their coming to Gabara, John met them with a body of 3000 men; from which step plainly perceiving their resolution was to give me battle, I left Chabolo with my 3000 men, and having set one of my trustiest friends to guard my camp, withdrew to Jotapata, being unwilling to be above forty furlongs from them, whence I wrote the deputies the following letter :

Josephus writes to the deputies again.

" If you find it absolutely necessary for me to come to you, there are four hundred and forty cities and villages in Galilee, and I will come to any one of them you please, Gabara and Gischala excepted; one of them being the place of John's nativity, and the other of his alliance."

The deputies plot the destruction of Josephus.

The deputies, having received this letter, returned no answer; but convening a council of their friends, among whom was John, advised in what manner they should attack me. John was for sending circular letters to all the cities, towns, and villages of Galilee, upon a presumption that there was one or more in every place inimical to me, who might be suborned to join in an information against me as a public enemy. He observed further, that nothing more need be done towards gaining the citizens of Jerusalem over to the opinion of my being a mortal enemy to the Galileans, than to send them these attestations well certified, which would certainly invalidate my credit with that people. The council of John met with general approbation.

Notwithstanding this cautionary proceeding, I heard every particular that passed by means of one Sacchæus, who brought me an account about the third hour of the night. I found now I had no time to lose, so that I immediately called for Jacob, (a brave man attached to me,) and sent him away with 200 men upon the scout betwixt Galilee and Gabara, with instructions to apprehend what passengers he thought fit, and send them to me in custody, especially if they had any letters about them. At the same time I dispatched Jeremias, one of my friends, with 600 soldiers, another way, to watch the passes from Jerusalem into Galilee, expressly charging them to seize all who carried letters about them, commit the parties to prison, and send me their papers. I sent abroad my mandates also throughout the whole province of Galilee, requiring all persons to attend me at Gabara the next morning, with their arms and three days provisions. Having divided the soldiers I had with me into four parts, I selected the most trusty, and commanded them to be near my person; and set centurions over them, to watch that no unknown soldier got amongst their number. Coming to Gabara next day, I found the whole plain before the town covered with armed troops, that came out of Galilee to my assistance, besides a confused multitude of country people. Upon my attempting to address them, I was interrupted with their acclamations, pronouncing me the benefactor and preserver of the country. I made them due acknowledgments for this token of their affection, advised them to offer no hostilities either individually or collectively, but to fix their tents in the fields, and be satisfied with their present pay, as it was my intention to put a period to the commotion without bloodshed. That very day the messenger sent by Jonathan with his letters happened to fall into the hands of the scouts I had planted in the roads, whom, according to orders, they strictly confined, and sent me the letters, which I found, upon perusal, to abound with invectives against myself. I determined therefore, without taking the least notice of the matter, to be as expeditious as possible in falling upon them.

When Jonathan and his colleagues heard of my arrival, they collected all their forces, and withdrew with John into the house of Jesus, which was a large tower, built in the manner of a citadel. As soon as their men had entered this place, they fastened all the doors except one, which they left open for me, waiting for my coming to pay them my compliments, now I was upon my journey. Besides, they gave orders to their soldiers to let me enter by myself as soon as I appeared, but refuse admittance to the rest of my followers. Thus they imagined they should easily get me into their power; but I effectually disappointed the hopes they entertained; for having had some apprehensions beforehand of their design against me, as soon as I arrived at the place, I retired to a lodging over against them, and pretended to betake myself to rest. The deputies, supposing me much fatigued, went into the plain to tamper with the multitude, and possess them with hatred and envy against me and my administration. But matters proved otherwise; for no sooner had the Galileans got sight of them, than they fell upon them with clamours and reproaches, calling out that I had acted the part of a faithful governor, and thereby attached them to my interest by the firmest and most indissoluble ties. At the same time they upbraided the deputies with coming, without their having offered them the least injury, to give a destructive blow to the affairs of their country; and advised them to return, as all their efforts would prove abortive.

Upon this encouragement I appeared, and presented myself to hear what Jonathan and his colleagues had to alledge against me. When I came publicly amongst them, the whole multitude received me with loud acclamations, and applauded my upright and generous conduct. The deputies, hearing this, were extremely apprehensive lest they should be exposed to the designs of the Galileans, the consequences of which might in my favour be fatal to them; they therefore bethought themselves how how they should retire. But finding themselves obstructed in their intention, (for I required them to stay,) they expressed astonishment at my words, and, with dejected countenances, could not keep their eyes from the earth. I then desired the multitude to cease their acclamations, and strictly charged the soldiers to be very careful in guarding the passes, to prevent John from making an unexpected fall upon me; advising the Galileans, at the same time, to be ready with their arms for fear of an irruption of the enemy, which might put them into disorder, and dishearten them. I reminded the deputies of a letter they had sent me, pretending a commission from Jerusalem to hear and determine on certain matters in controversy betwixt John and myself, producing the letter at the same time in proof of my suggestion. I observed that, "admitting Jonathan and his colleagues had a just pretence for calling me to account for my conduct, as governor of the province, they must pronounce me innocent upon the evident testimony of two or three witnesses of unquestionable probity in my justification." I further appealed not only to two or three competent vouchers, but to every one present, if I had not behaved myself, both in a public and private capacity, as became a man of integrity and honour; and called upon the people of Galilee, in the most solemn manner, to speak the truth, and the whole truth, as if they were sworn evidences in the cause, and those men, who called themselves deputies from the sanhedrim, were really the judges.

I had scarcely uttered these words, when the multitude, with one voice, pronounced me their benefactor and preserver. They testified for my past conduct, and entreated me to pursue the same measures in future; affirming, with an oath, that the chastity of their wives had been inviolably preserved, and none of them exposed to any injurious or violent treatment through my means. I then read openly to the Galileans Jonathan's two intercepted letters, that were brought me by my scouts. These were replete with falsehood and invective, as if I had acted like a tyrant instead of governor over my people. I was not, I told them, willing to let my enemies know that I had their messengers in custody, lest it should hinder their sending that way another time; so that I pretended they were brought over to me voluntarily by the messengers themselves. The multitude, on hearing these things, were so exasperated at Jonathan and his colleagues, that they would have fallen sacrifices to their fury, had I not interposed and restrained them. I gave them, however, their liberty, on condition of their repenting, and returning home to those that sent them, and acquainting them with the real truth of my administration. I then dismissed them, though I perfectly knew they would never fulfil their promise. But the multitude continued extremely enraged, and entreated me to permit them to punish them as their crimes deserved. I still desired them to refrain, being persuaded that the least sedition would be prejudicial to the common good. All I could do could not appease their rage, till at length they beset the house where Jonathan and his colleagues resorted.

When I found my utmost efforts would not restrain them, I took horse, and ordered them to follow me to Segane, a village of Arabia, about forty furlongs distant from Gabara; and by this stratagem I obviated the imputation of being the author of a civil war. Being advanced within a little of the place, I ordered my troops to halt, and, after a few words of necessary precaution, not to be intemperate and vindictive, I selected an hundred men, of years and experience, and ordered them to make ready to go to Jerusalem, with a complaint against the ringleaders of these broils. I gave them, moreover, in charge, if they found the Sanhedrim disposed in my favour, to solicit a new commission for my continuance in the command of Galilee, and the removal of Jonathan and his colleagues. With these instructions I dispatched them away, on the third day after this meeting, with a guard of five hundred armed men. I wrote also to my friends in Samaria, to grant my commissioners a fair and free passage through their country; for the city was at that time under the Roman jurisdiction; and it was necessary for those who were desirous of making a speedy journey to Jerusalem to pass that way, so that they arrived in three days. I conducted them myself to the frontiers of Galilee, having set scouts on the road to prevent a report being spread of their departure. After this I made a short stay at Japha.

Jonathan and his colleagues, finding themselves wholly disappointed in the designs they had formed against me, sent John back to Gischala, and went themselves to the city of Tiberias, in hopes of reducing it to obedience; as Jesus, the chief magistrate there, had, in a letter, promised them to bring the people over to their interest. But Silas, my lieutenant, sent me word, from time to time, of every proceeding, and pressed me, with the utmost expedition, to repair thither. I complied with his solicitation; but, on my arrival, had nearly lost my life, from the following cause.

The colleagues, having formed a desperate faction against me in Tiberias, were not a little startled upon my coming thither; but paid me the compliment, however, of a visit, congratulating me on the reputation I had acquired by the integrity of my conduct in the administration of Galilee, and not without assuming to themselves some share in the honour of it, both as being their fellow-citizen, and disciple. They professed a much greater kindness for me than John, and assured me with such deadly imprecations of their resolution to deliver him into my hands, as to obviate every degree of suspicion, and obtain my entire confidence. They then desired me to draw off to some other place, suggesting, to countenance the matter, that the sabbath approached, and it was highly indecent to occasion the least tumult on that day.

Upon this pretence I repaired to Tarichæa, not suspecting any thing; but yet, for the sake of security, I planted my spies and informers up and down the road, to observe and report to me what was said and done concerning me. On the day following the people met together in the prolencha, or oratory, a place of public worship, capable of containing a vast multitude. When Jonathan entered, he had not the assurance to make an open declaration, but merely hinted that their city stood in need of a better governor. Jesus, the chief magistrate, finding this, pulled off the mask, and openly declared, that "it was infinitely better for them to have four rulers than one, especially if they were men of honourable extraction and known prudence, as those were;" pointing to Jonathan and his colleagues, who stood by. Justus approved what Jesus had said, and brought several over to his opinion. But the main body of the people could not be induced to favour the proceedings, and a sedition had unquestionably arisen, had they not thought proper to break up the assembly; for the sixth hour was come, and it is the custom of our nation to dine before the sabbath begins. The deputies therefore put off the debate till the day following, without coming to any present issue.

Having intelligence of every thing that was transacted, I resolved to go to Tiberias in the morning, and, upon my arrival, found the people assembled together in the oratory, without understanding the intention of their meeting. The colleagues so little suspected to see me there, that they appeared in a kind of confusion. At length they meditated the divulging of a report that a body of Roman horse was seen upon the confines, at some distance, about thirty furlongs from the city, at a place called Homonea. They then proceeded to represent to the multitude the obligation they were under not to suffer the enemy to commit barefaced depredations in the country: but this was designed to draw me out of the city, under pretence of lending them my assistance, and in the mean time give them an opportunity of making the citizens my enemies.

Though I well knew their design, yet, that I might not appear less anxious for their security than I ought ought to be, I marched out of the city. But finding at the place not the least footstep of an enemy, I hastened back to the city, where the senate and people were assembled together, and the deputies were laying before them a long accusation against me, as inattentive to the duties of my station, and addicted to wanton pleasures. They then produced four letters, pretended to have been written them from those who dwelt on the frontiers of Galilee, entreating them, through a pretence that a body of Roman troops would be with them in three days to ravage their country, to hasten their arrival amongst them as much as possible, and not defer the time. The credulous Tiberians admitted the whole story as current, and unanimously exclaimed, that it was now high time to send a seasonable relief to their allies. As I knew the drift of the colleagues, I answered, I would readily obey their orders, and promised, without hesitation, to go and carry on the war in their defence. But as it appeared, from the letters, that the Romans had made their irruptions into four several places, I persuaded them that there was a necessity to make a division of the army into so many parts, and put the four deputies at the head of them, as it was the duty of good patriots and valiant men to serve their country in their persons, as well as with their conduct and counsel; at the same time I pointed out to them the impossibility of my being at the head of any more than one party. This advice was approved by the multitude, who obliged the deputies to take a share in the expedition; though they were greatly chagrined when they found their designs frustrated by the stratagem I used to disconcert their measures.

But one of them, named Ananias, a seditious turbulent man, persuaded the multitude to have a fast kept the next day by all the people, and ordered them to come without arms, which, he observed, would avail nothing, unless favoured by the assistance of the Almighty. This proceeded from no religious motive; and was, in reality, designed to disarm me and my party. I was, however, under a necessity of complying with the proposal, as I would not seem avert to so pious an admonition; in consequence of which every one withdrew to his own habitation.

The colleagues wrote in all haste to John to come early the next morning with all the force he could make; for if they could but get me into their hands, the business was done. John, receiving the letter, resolved to obey the summons. The following day I ordered two of the most resolute and faithful of my guards to conceal their daggers under their garments, and attend me, in order to resist any violence that might be offered me. I put on a breast-plate, and girt on my sword, as secretly as I could, and in that manner went to the prosencha.

Jesus, however, refused to admit all my attendants, and only suffered me to enter with some particular friends. As we were just on the point of entering upon our devotions, Jesus began to discourse on the rich furniture, and the mats of silver, that were taken upon the firing of the royal palace, and asked where it was to be found, and who had it in possession? This was done to spin out the time, till John might come up with his army. I answered in brief, that it was all deposited in the hands of Capellus, and ten of the principal citizens of Tiberias, to whom I referred them for the truth of my declarations. They then enquired what I had done with the twenty pieces of gold? I told them I had given them to the envoys I had sent to Jerusalem to defray the expences of their journey. The colleagues replied, I was highly culpable in paying my particular agents out of the public treasure.

These proceedings exasperated the multitude, who plainly observed their malice against me; and I, desirous of irritating them more, if possible, against the colleagues, added, that, "if I was culpable in gratifying my messengers out of the public stock, I would willingly refund the whole sum." The fairer matters appeared on my side, the more outrageous were the multitude, when they perceived the whole story founded upon envy and calumny. This fell out so contrary to expectation, that Jesus ordered all but the senators to depart, observing, that the business could not be transacted amidst the clamour of a multitude. The people exclaimed, on the other side, that they were determined not to suffer me to remain without them. Upon this a messenger whispered Jonathan, that John would be with him immediately, with his party; so that, upon this encouragement, he broke out into these words: "Imagine not, citizens of Tiberias, that I would have Josephus punished for the undue appropriation of the gold, but for imposing on a credulous multitude, in the tyrannical affectation and exercise of an arbitrary power." At that word certain bravoes, that were in the plot, set upon me, and had undoubtedly destroyed me; if my particular friends had not immediately drawn, and kept them off; the common people at the same time threatening to stone John; so that, betwixt them both, I was rescued out of the hands of my enemies. Upon my withdrawing to make my escape, I met John upon the way, with his troops, upon their march to the assistance of Jonathan. This put me upon some apprehension of danger; but I found means to evade them, and reach the lake, where, having the good fortune to find a vessel, I embarked, and passed over to Taricheæ; a deliverance beyond all expectation.

Escape
Taricheæ.

The first thing, after my arrival, was to summon the chief men of the province, and relate to them the barbarous treatment I had received from Jonathan and the Tiberians, contrary to common faith, humanity, and justice. This so incensed the Galileans, that they insisted on an immediate declaration of war against John and his colleagues, in order to extirpate such monsters of iniquity. I endeavoured, by fair means, to restrain their impetuosity, advising them, for the present, to wait till we had an answer from the deputies we sent to Jerusalem; for there was no resolution to be taken without their approbation. With these words they were pacified; and John, when he found his design ineffectual, went back to Gischala.

Not many days after this the deputies brought word from Jerusalem, that the government there was much offended with Ananus, and Simon, the son of Gamaliel, for presuming, without any public authority, to send their agents to remove me from my government of Galilee; and that the people were so incensed at this proceeding, that they were ready to set fire to their houses. They brought letters also, by which the head men of Jerusalem, with the consent of the people, confirmed me in my government; and commanded John, and his associates, instantly to depart the place.

Upon the receipt of these letters I went to Arbela, where the Galileans being assembled, the deputies made a report of what passed at Jerusalem, how heinously they took the base actions of Jonathan and his colleagues, and how they confirmed me, by their decree, in the government of the country, with a command to the pretended deputies to quit their pretences. I took care to send them the letters by a messenger, to whom I gave orders to be very strict in observing their design. Upon the receipt of the letters, they were put into the utmost confusion, and sent for John, and the leading men of Tiberias and Gabara, to consult about the present state of affairs, and advise what measures it was expedient to pursue. The Tiberians were for their keeping the power still in their own hands, and not abandoning a people that had delivered themselves up to their protection; especially against an enemy that had threatened them with an invasion, as they falsely and maliciously represented I had done.

John not only gave into this opinion, but advised the sending two of their body to Jerusalem, with a charge of mal-administration against me, which, he said, betwixt the credit of the accusers, and the variable humour of the common people, could not fail of making an impression. The counsel of John being approved, they sent Jonathan and Ananias to Jerusalem upon the commission, with a guard of a hundred hundred soldiers to attend their persons, the other two staying behind at Tiberias. The inhabitants of that place immediately set about repairing their walls, betook themselves to their arms, and sent for John's troops, that were then at Gilchala in a considerable body, to be within distance of assisting them against me, if there should be any occasion.

Jonathan and his people being now upon their march, and advanced as far as Dabaritta, a village upon the borders of Galilee, fell about midnight into a party of my out-guards, who took away their arms, and kept them prisoners according to order. Levi, who commanded the party, gave me notice of the encounter; and two days after, as if I had been ignorant of what had happened, I sent a messenger to the Tiberians, to advise them to lay down their arms. But they returned a very scurrilous answer, supposing that Jonathan and his party were by that time arrived at Jerusalem. I was resolved, notwithstanding, to requite them by means of one stratagem or another; though I could not be persuaded to make war against my own fellow-citizens. In order to inveigle them out of the town, I took 10,000 of my choicest troops, and divided them into three bodies. Part of them I planted privately in Dora, and a thousand of them in another village, upon the mountains, four furlongs from Tiberias, with orders to be ready upon the first signal to make a sally. I came out of the village myself, and encamped on an open plain within sight of the Tiberians, who made towards me, and treated me with reproachful language: nay, they proceeded so far in their folly and insolence, as to provide a mock funeral for me; and, with fantastical pomp, exposed my image in the field, surrounded by mourners. But I only made this farce the subject of my mirth and diversion.

Being desirous to intercept Simon and Joazar by a stratagem, I sent a messenger to them, desiring them to come a little way out of the city, conducted by their friends, as I was ready, upon meeting them, to enter into an alliance, and divide the government of Galilee with them. Joazar, who was crafty and suspicious, kept himself at a distance; but Simon, lured by the prospect of advantage, came over to me, attended by his guards and friends. I received him with becoming respect for the honours he had done me; but presently taking him aside, through a pretence of speaking with him apart, and thinking I had conveyed him far enough, I gave him up to my friends to carry him to the next village, and then giving the signal for my men to come forth, marched with them instantly to besiege Tiberias. A sharp encounter followed, and the Tiberians were almost in possession of the victory, till observing my men inclined to retreat, I roused their courage, when they rallied, and, with extreme difficulty and hazard, pursued the enemy to their very gates. Other forces passing the lake at this juncture to my relief, I ordered them to set fire to the first house they could seize upon. The Tiberians seeing this, and imagining their city stormed, threw down their arms, and, with their wives and children, cast themselves at my feet, imploring me to spare the place of their nativity. Prevailed upon by their entreaties, I restrained the fury of my soldiers, and, as night was drawing on, returned with my men from the siege, and refreshed myself. I sent for Simon to regale with me, and gave him the comfortable assurance of sending him safe back to Jerusalem, with all necessities and conveniences for his journey.

The next day I marched into Tiberias, with an army of 10,000 men; and summoning the principal citizens into the circus, enjoined them to tell me who were the ringleaders of the revolt. Upon their information, I sent them all prisoners to Jotapata, except Jonathan and his colleagues, whom I set at liberty, with a guard of 500 soldiers to conduct them to Jerusalem, and an allowance for the expence of their journey. The Tiberians came again before me, and entreated pardon for what they had done, promising to make ample amends by their future fidelity, and requesting that the pillage, which the soldiers had taken, might be restored to the right owners. Hereupon I ordered the whole booty to be produced before me; but being dilatorily obeyed, and observing one of my men with a garment more splendid than ordinary, I enquired whence he had it, and being told out of the plunder of Tiberias, I commanded him to be severely scourged, with a menace of greater rigour upon any man that should afterwards presume to withhold any part of what he had taken. By this means abundance of things were brought to me, which were restored to the Tiberians according to their respective claims.

I cannot pass over this subject without taking notice of some palpable falsities imposed upon the world, and transmitted to posterity by Justus, and certain other writers, who have treated of this argument, and, through partiality on the one hand, and prejudice on the other, misrepresented facts, and thereby perverted the grand end of history. This class of men may justly be compared to those who produce forged instruments or writings concerning conveyances of property, but, because they are not liable to the same punishment as others, disregard and despise truth. Justus, upon this principle, took upon him to write of these transactions in the war of which I bore a part, and has feigned several stories of me, and introduced many particulars of his own country, which are not founded on the basis of truth. I therefore think I am bound to defend myself against his false assertions, and shall take the freedom to introduce some things which I have not disclosed before; because I hold it as an invariable principle, that whoever undertakes to write history, should not advance any subject without conviction of its authenticity; though, at the same time, he is bound to observe the law of candour and moderation. Thus, then, I expostulate with Justus, as if he were present.

Josephus censures unfaithful historians.

"Say, Justus, thou that art the greatest pretender of all men living to the good faith of a candid author, how was it possible for me and the Galileans to be the cause of the revolt of thy countrymen from their prince, and from the Roman empire, when you yourself, and your Tiberians, had already made war upon the Decapolitans in Syria, and burnt their villages? By the token that one of your servants fell in the action, and all this before ever I received my commission from Jerusalem for the government of Galilee? I do not deliver this barely upon my own credit, but refer the reader, for his better satisfaction, to the memorials and records of the emperor Vespasian; wherein it will appear, that, while he was at Ptolemais, the people of Decapolis were still pressing him with restless importunities to do them justice upon you, as the principal promoter of all their troubles; which he had undoubtedly done, if king Agrippa, to whom the care of the execution was committed, had not given you your life, upon the mediation of his sister Berenice: and this pardon did not yet hinder you from being still kept in prison a long time after. Besides, the whole course of your life was uniform, as may be seen from your following practices; for I shall make it as clear as the sun, that it was upon your tampering and instigation, that your people broke out into a rebellion against the Romans. I must now give the reader to understand, that neither you yourself, nor the rest of the Tiberians, were ever faithful, either to your king, or to the emperor.

Expostulation of Josephus with Justus.

"The fairest cities of Galilee are Sepphoris and Tiberias; the latter the place of your birth, Justus; the former seated in the middle of the province, with several villages depending upon it; and the people so true to their masters, that they did not only refuse me entrance into the place, but, by a public edict, prohibited all their citizens from bearing arms for the Jews. And for their better security, they lured me into promise to wall their town; which I had no sooner done, than they turned me off with contempt; submitting also, at the same time, without any difficulty, to a Roman garrison, under Cestius Gallus, who was then governor of Syria; and this at a

"season, too, when I held the whole neighbourhood
 "in awe. Nay, so tender were they of giving the "least colour for a suspicion of their breaking faith
 "with the Romans, that, when the temple of Jeru"salem was besieged, and the common cause and "interest of our nation at stake upon that action,
 "they would not so much as contribute in any sort
 "to their relief. But, Justus, considering the situ"ation of your country, as it stands upon the bor"der of the lake of Gennesareth, some thirty fur"longs from Hippos, sixty from Gadara, and an "hundred and twenty from Scythopolis, (places
 "under the king's allegiance, and none of the Jews
 "garrisons thereabouts; besides, that they wanted
 "neither men or arms;) what should hinder you
 "now, with all these advantages on your side, from "discharging your duty to the Romans, if you had "a mind? Or, supposing the matter to be as you "say, and that, in truth, I was at that time in some "measure the cause of the war, who was to blame
 "afterward? You know very well that the Ro"mans had got me into their power before the siege
 "was laid to Jerusalem, Jotapata and divers other "castles taken by assault, and great numbers of the "Galileans cut off upon several encounters. Now
 "if it be true, as you suggest, that the war was al"together against your will, and that you were "driven upon it by force, how came it to pass that "you did not lay down your arms, and cast your"self at the feet of your prince, and of the Romans,
 "when that pretended necessity was over? for you
 "were now out of danger of any hurt that I could "do you. But you were still disposed to stand it "out, till Vespasian was advanced with his army
 "up to your very walls; and it was then high time
 "for you to call for quarter, when you found your"self certainly ruined without it. That submission "would not have served your turn neither, without "the intercession of the king to Vespasian in your "behalf; for the city had been razed to the very "ground, if he had not obtained the emperor's par"don for your madness and folly: so that your "enmity to the Romans was purely out of the ma"lice of your own heart, without any fault of mine.
 "How many times have I protected you, and had "you at mercy, without spilling so much as one
 "drop of your blood? whereas it is notoriously
 "known, that, in the rage of your intestine broils,
 "not in the king's cause, nor in the Romans, but
 "out of a spirit of animosity and rancour one against "another, you put to death no less than an hundred "and eighty-five citizens at a time, when I was "blocked up in Jotapata. And were there not "two thousand Tiberians killed and taken at Je"rusalem? Were you no enemy because you were
 "at that time with the king? not out of love or "duty, but because I frightened you thither. If you "will have me to be an ill man, what was Justus
 "then? A wretch that Vespasian pronounced sen"tence of death upon, though the execution of it "was afterwards remitted by king Agrippa: twice "a prisoner, as often an exile: once redeemed from "the very gibbet, upon the mediation of Berenice,
 "the emperor's sister; and finally, after all this, so
 "false to the trust of a secretary, which he had the "honour to have conferred upon him, that his "master banished him his court and his presence
 "for ever. But, Justus, without tracing your mis-
 "demeanours, I cannot sufficiently admire the ar"rogance of your setting up for the most perfect
 "and exact historian of this war, to the disparage-
 "ment of all others, when effectually you are but "a mere stranger to the whole matter, even to what "has passed in Galilee itself; for in the time of that "action you were with the king at Berytus. And "as for the siege of Jotapata, how was it possible "for you to make any report of my behaviour in "that adventure, when there was not one man left "alive but myself to tell you the story? You will "say, perhaps, that the relation you have given of "what passed at Jerusalem may be more correct.
 "But it is a thing hardly to be imagined, that you,
 "who were neither personally in the action, or
 "ever so much as read Vespasian's commentaries
 "upon that part of the war, should be so well in"formed of the story. I take for granted that you "never read Vespasian, for there are several cases

 "wherein you point blank contradict him: but it
 "you are really so vain as to fancy to yourself that "you have, in this relation, out-done all mankind,
 "how came it that we were not blessed with the "fight of this admirable piece, while Vespasian or
 "Titus, the generals themselves, were yet living?
 "or in the days of Agrippa and his relations,
 "who were all great masters and critics in the "Greek tongue? Why was this history of yours
 "kept so long in the dark, (for it has been now "finished a matter of twenty years,) when you "might have had so many living eye witnesses of "the fact, to vouch for the good faith and credit "of the work? Why was it suppressed thus "long, and now published at last? but that "you durst not stand the test and censure of "the world, while so many people were yet alive
 "that were able to disprove you. I went quite "another way to work with my writings, and "put them into the hands of the emperors them"selves, that had the government of the war, and
 "this while all the particulars of it were still fresh
 "in every one's memory; my conscience, in fine,
 "acquitting me, that I delivered the truth without "adding or diminishing; upon which account my "writings have received as favourable an acceptance
 "in the world as I could desire. These memorials I "communicated to several persons, one after ano"ther, that had borne a part in the war, as king
 "Agrippa, and some certain relations of his. Nay,
 "Titus himself gave such testimony in approba"tion of this history, that he recommended it to "the world as an authentic record; and, by an "order under his own hand, assigned it a place in "his library. King Agrippa was so pleased with "the integrity and candour of it, that he wrote me
 "sixty-two letters in confirmation of the credit of "it. Two of them I have here subjoined to the end,
 "that the matter may be allowed to speak for it"self."

King Agrippa to his dearest friend, Josephus, greeting:

"I HAVE read your book with great delight,
 "and look upon it to be the most pertinent and "exact account of any I have yet seen. Send me
 "the remainder; and so I bid you farewell, my
 "dear friend."

King Agrippa to Josephus, his dearest friend, health:

"UPON the perusal of your writings, I per"ceive you have little need of any thing further "that I can tell you; only when we meet next, I "may, perhaps, suggest some certain passages to your "consideration that have escaped your knowledge."

Thus far with regard to Justus, with whom I thought myself indispensably obliged to make this comparison.

When I had settled the affairs of Tiberias, and assembled a council of my friends, I advised what measures were to be put in execution concerning John. All the Galileans were of opinion, that I should put them in arms, and fall upon John as the real author of the late troubles. But I could not coincide with them in opinion, as I was desirous to terminate the difference without bloodshed, wherefore I desired them to be very diligent in procuring a list of the whole faction. Having thereby learned the names of the most considerable of John's party, I published an act of amnesty to all that should come in within twenty days, lay down their arms, and return to their duty; but setting forth that those who should stand out beyond that time might expect all the extremities of fire, sword, and pillage.

This being an invitation as well as a menace, wrought so effectually on the associates of John, that 4000 of them threw down their arms, and came over to me. Only his fellow citizens of Gischala stayed behind, and 1500 Tyrian mercenaries,

ries. This one effort so effectually defeated the measures of John, that, through fear, he confined himself within the limits of his own country.

About this time the people of Sepphoris, confiding in the strength of the place, and seeing me engaged in other affairs, grew insolent, and took up arms. They sent to Cestius Gallus, who was then governor of Syria, desiring he would come in person, and receive the obedience of their city; or at least send thither a garrison of soldiers. Cestius promised them to come, but gave no intimation of the time. Upon intelligence of what had passed betwixt them, I marched up directly to the place, attacked and carried it by storm. The Galileans, desirous of improving this advantage, as an opportunity for taking their revenge on the Sepphorites, rushed furiously into the town, with a resolution of destroying both inhabitants and city. The people had quitted their habitations, and withdrawn into the castle for protection; while the soldiers set fire to the empty houses, and committed depredations without bounds. I was much concerned at these violences, and ordered the soldiers to desist from such unnatural proceedings against men of their own tribe and profession. When I found that neither entreaties or commands had any effect upon them, I ordered some of my trusty friends to divulge a report, that the Romans, with a great body of forces, had attacked the other part of the city. This I did with no other design than that, the report spreading abroad, the fury of the Galileans might be restrained, and Sepphoris preserved from ruin. At length the stratagem had its effect; for, upon hearing this report, they were apprehensive for themselves, ceased from plunder, and betook themselves to flight, especially when they saw me, their general, do the same; for, in order to gain more credit to the report, I pretended to be terrified in like manner with the danger that threatened. Thus the Sepphorites, by this artifice, preserved their lives and effects.

Tiberias was upon the point of being plundered by the Galileans on the following occasion. The principal men of their senate wrote to the king, desiring he would come to them, and take possession of their city. The king promised to come, and wrote a letter in answer to theirs, which he gave to one of his attendants, named Crispus, by birth a Jew, to carry it to Tiberias. Some of the Galileans happening to meet with Crispus as he was bringing the letter, apprehended and brought him to me. When this came to the ears of the people, they were enraged, and immediately betook themselves to arms. Many of them assembling the next day, came to the city of Aschois, where I then resided, and, with loud exclamations, called the Tiberians traitors, and of the king's faction; and desired leave of me to go down and utterly destroy their city; for they were as averse to the Tiberians as the Sepphorites.

When I heard of this procedure, I was doubtful in what manner to preserve the city from the enraged Galileans; for there was no denying or palliating the charge brought against the inhabitants of surrendering up their city; the letter the king had written back being too convincing a proof of it. Weighing the affair, therefore, some time in my mind, I reasoned the case with them in the following manner, by way of answer: "That the Tiberians were highly culpable; nor would I be any obstacle to the sacking of their city; nevertheless nothing of that kind should be put in execution without previous advice, and mature consideration; for that, upon further scrutiny, a faction might be found among the noble Galileans as deep in this plot upon their liberties as the Tiberians themselves. That, therefore, I recommended patience, till better information could be procured of the authors of the defection and treachery, and then that every one should be surrendered up and brought to condign punishment." By these means I pacified the multitude, and they quietly dispersed.

Having ordered the man sent by the king to be put in chains, I pretended I was obliged to leave the kingdom for a few days to transact an affair of moment, and then sending privately for Crispus, I suggested to him to render the guard intoxicated, and then make his escape to the king. Thus Tiberias, which was again exposed to the last extremity, was delivered by my means from the danger which threatened it.

While affairs were in this situation, Justus, the son of Pistus, without my knowledge, went over to the king; and the reason was briefly this. Upon the breaking out of the war between the Jews and the Romans, the Tiberians were resolved to persevere in their obedience to the king, and on no pretence whatever abandon the Romans. Justus, notwithstanding this resolution, endeavoured to spirit them up to a revolt, because he earnestly longed for a change, from which he hoped he should obtain the advantage of wresting into his hands the government of Galilee, as well as his own country.

But his scheme proved abortive; for the Galileans, who were avowed enemies to the Tiberians, from the indignation they entertained for the hardships they had suffered from Justus before the commencement of the war, could not endure to think of having him for their general. I myself also, who had received the government of Galilee from the hands of the Sanhedrim at Jerusalem, was frequently actuated by such a rage against him, that I have been ready to put him to death, as not being able to brook his insupportable malice. He was therefore very apprehensive that my passion would come to extremity, and went over to the king, supposing he should live in more security with him.

The Sepphorites being unexpectedly freed from their first danger, sent to Cestius Gallus, either to come immediately, and take possession of their city, or furnish them with a force sufficient to repel the incursions of an enemy. At length they prevailed with Gallus to transmit them a supply of cavalry and infantry, which they received into the city in the night time. The bordering country lying exposed to the depredations of the Roman soldiers, after I had taken up the forces I had at hand, I went to Garesine, where I encamped about twenty furlongs from Sepphoris, and in the night marching with my arms to the city, sat down before the walls, and then ordering a great number of my men to mount the walls with their scaling ladders, I made myself immediately master of the greatest part of the city: but being unacquainted with the place, we were obliged to retire, having slain twelve foot-soldiers and two horsemen belonging to the Romans, with the loss of only one man on our side. Soon after this we had sharp encounter with the Roman horse, in which having defended ourselves a long time with great bravery, we were obliged to yield the victory to the enemy; for as I was surrounded by the enemy, and my men seeing it, they turned their backs upon me, and fled through fear. In this action I lost Justus, one of my guards, formerly in the service of the king.

About this time came a body of horse and foot forces sent by the king, under the command of Sylla, captain of the royal guards, who encamped about five furlongs from Julias, and planted his scouts along the road which led to Cana and the castle of Gamala, to cut off all relief.

As soon as I came to hear of this, I sent two thousand armed men under the command of Jeremias. Both armies encamped about a furlong from Julias; but nothing passed on either side but slight skirmishes, till I had an opportunity to come up with three thousand more of my men. The day following, after planting a strong ambush in a bottom, at a convenient distance from the enemy, I offered the king's troops battle, with orders to my men to turn their backs on the first charge, and so fly before the enemy, till they had drawn them within the reach of the ambuscade.

This stratagem was crowned with the desired success; for Sylla, not supposing it to have been a pretended pretended flight, drew out his army, and pursued them. Immediately my men, whom I had secured in the rear, sallied out of their ambuscades, fell upon him, and put the rest of his army into great disorder. When I saw this, I rallied my men immediately, faced the royal army, and put them to flight. Victory had certainly declared itself for me this day, had not an unfortunate accident prevented it: my horse carrying me into a boggy place, the fall put my wrist out of joint, so that I was obliged to be carried off to Cepharnome, a village near at hand, for my relief. Upon this disaster my people, fearing some worse accident had befallen me, gave over the pursuit, and returned in extreme concern for my welfare. I then applied to the physicians, and, through a fever I had upon me, was obliged to stay there that day, but was conveyed to Taricheæ at night.

Sylla and his army, upon the news of my misfortune, resumed courage, and knowing my camp was not very strictly guarded, he planted a body of horse in ambush, before Jordan, and, as soon as it was day, strove to bring us to an engagement. My forces accepting the challenge, marched into the plain, and fell into an ambush of the enemies horse, by whom they were charged, routed, and put to flight, with the loss of only six men. But the enemy did not maintain the victory; for hearing a fresh supply of forces were arrived by shipping from Taricheæ, they through fear sounded retreat.

Vespasian and Agrippa come to Tyre.

Soon after this Vespasian came to Tyre, and with him king Agrippa, whom the Tyrians reviled as an enemy both to them and the Romans; alledging it was by his command that Philip, his general, delivered up both the royal palace at Jerusalem, and the Roman garrison there. Vespasian severely reprimanded the Tyrians for their dishonouring a crowned head, and a friend to the Romans; and advised the king to send Philip to Rome to clear himself to the emperor. He accordingly went upon that design; but finding Nero greatly embarrassed by his civil wars, went back again to Agrippa without his errand.

Vespasian, after this, coming to Ptolemais, the principal citizens of Decapolis preferred grievous complaints against Justus for burning their country. Justus was accordingly delivered up to Agrippa to be punished for the injuries done to his subjects. The king only made him a prisoner, without ever consulting the emperor in the matter, as we have observed before.

The people of Sepphoris went out to meet Vespasian, and received a garrison from him of their own appointment, and Placidus for their governor, who was the man I had to do with till the emperor came into Galilee himself. But as to what concerns the story, and the manner of his coming, my retreat to Jotapata, after the first encounter I had at Taricheæ, what I did in defence of the palace, how I came after a long siege to be taken prisoner, how afterwards to be set at liberty, and, in fine, the manner in which I deported myself throughout the whole course of the Jewish war, these points have been already so amply treated, that there remains but little more to be added upon this subject, than some particular transactions of my own life.

The siege of Jotapata being now drawn to a conclusion, though I was in the hands of the Romans, and strictly guarded, Vespasian treated me with great respect; in consequence of which I took to wife a native of Cesarea, at that time a prisoner. She being divorced, and I having obtained my liberty, proceeded with Vespasian to Alexandria, where I married another wife. From this place I went with Titus to the siege of Jerusalem, where my life was frequently exposed to danger; for the Jews were continually using stratagems to get me into their hands; and the Romans, whenever they met with any disadvantage, attributed it to some treachery of mine, brought accusations against me before the emperor, and desired him to give me up to punishment to their betrayer. But Titus Cæsar was well acquainted with the uncertainty of fortune, and returned no answer to the vehement solicitations of the soldiers against me.

Titus to Josephus.

When Jerusalem was on the point of being taken, Titus was so generous as to offer me what I pleased, for my own use, out of the plunder of the city: but as, after the ruin of my country, nothing could more alleviate my miseries than the liberty of my friends, I requested that favour, as also for the sacred books, with which the conqueror immediately complied. I begged the life of my brother, and the liberty of fifty of my best friends, in which I succeeded according to my wishes. I also obtained permission to go into the temple, where a great number of captive women and children were shut up; and as many of my friends and acquaintance as I found there, who amounted to one hundred and ninety persons, I set at liberty; and, without paying any thing for their ransom, dismissed, and restored them to their former state of life.

I was then sent by Titus, in company with Cerialis, and a thousand horse, to a village called Thecoa, to take a view of the situation and disposition of the place for the forming a camp there. Upon my return, there were many prisoners crucified by the road side, and among others three men with whom I had a friendship of long standing. I was so wounded at this spectacle, that I went to Titus, and falling at his feet, represented the case to him; upon which he gave immediate orders to have them taken down, and all imaginable care taken of them. Two of them died under the hands of the physicians; but the third survived the experiment.

When Titus had put an end to the distractions in Judæa, he assigned me a portion of lands at a distance, in exchange for others I had in the vicinity of Jerusalem. This he did from a motive of kindness and respect; for he knew it would be neither commodious or profitable for me to have my habitation amidst the Roman troops that were, of necessity, to be quartered about the metropolis for the security of the province.

The emperor Vespasian also did me the honour, upon my arrival at Rome, of entertaining me in a most splendid manner. He assigned me an apartment in the palace where he resided before he came to the empire. He favoured me with the privilege of a Roman citizen, gave me an annual pension, and retained his respect and kindness to the end of his life, which incurred the mortal envy and hatred of my own nation. One Jonathan, a Jew, having raised a sedition in Cyrene, and persuaded above two thousand of the natives to join in the commotion, became at length the cause of their ruin; for, being defeated by the governor of the province, he was sent to the emperor, before whom he averred that I had supplied him with arms and money; but Vespasian, not crediting the calumny, sentenced him to death for it. There were several other accusations brought against me by those who envied my happiness, but, through Divine Providence, I got clear of them all, and had a fair establishment allotted me in Judæa thro' the bounty of Vespasian.

About this time I put away my wife, from a disapprobation of her conduct, having had three children by her, two of whom died, and only Hyrcanus living. After this divorce I took another wife, by birth a Candian, by profession a Jewess, of noble descent, and exemplary virtue. I had by her two sons; Justus, the eldest, Simonides, the younger, who was also surnamed Agrippa. These are the circumstances of my family.

I was so happy as to be still in favour with the Cæsars, for, on the demise of Vespasian, Titus treated me with the same honourable respect as his father had done. Domitian also, who succeeded Titus, held me in the highest esteem, put to death several of my Jewish false accusers, and commanded an eunuch, a servant of mine, to be severely punished for an insidious information against me. As a testimony of his singular kindness, he hath been pleased to grant me an exemption from all taxes and duties for the estate I possess in Judæa. Nor have my obligations been less in proportion to the empress Domitia, his consort. This is a brief sketch of my life, from which the world may form a judgment of my principles and manners.

CONCERNING

Our Blessed Saviour JESUS CHRIST, JOHN the BAPTIST, &c.

CLEARLY VINDICATED,

FROM THE

Concurrent Authorities of Ecclesiastical and other Writers of Authenticity, such as Historians, Biographers, the Ancient Fathers of the Church, &c.

AS we meet with many important testimonies in Josephus, the Jewish historian, concerning John the Baptist, the harbinger or forerunner of Jesus of Nazareth, concerning Jesus of Nazareth himself, and also James the Just, the brother of Jesus of Nazareth, and since the principal testimony has been questioned by many, and rejected by some as spurious, I hold it my duty, having ever declared my firm belief that these testimonies are genuine, to produce original evidences, in order to confirm them, and then make proper observations for the more compleat satisfaction of the reader. Before I enter upon my main design, it may not be impertinent, by way of preparatory, to quote the opinion of, perhaps, the most learned person, and competent judge, that ever was, as to the authority of Josephus; I mean Joseph Scaliger, from whose works, in Latin, the following is a translation.

" Josephus is the most diligent, and the greatest lover of truth, of all writers. We can confidently affirm of him, that it is more safe to believe him, not only as to the affairs of the Jews, but also as to those that are foreign to them, than all the Greek and Latin writers; and this because his fidelity, and his compass of learning, are every where most conspicuous."

TACITUS.

TACITUS writes, in his annals, that " Nero, in order to stifle the rumour, (though he himself set Rome on fire,) ascribed it to those people who were hated for their strange practices, and called, by the vulgar, Christians. These he punished exquisitely. The author of this name was Christ, who, in the reign of Tiberius, was put to death by Pontius Pilate, the procurator."

Since Josephus gives us his testimony, and since almost all the rest that is true of the Jews in Tacitus, was directly taken by him out of Josephus, there can remain no reason to doubt but this passage was taken from him also. He could not have this account from that other Jewish historian, Justus, of Tiberias; for Photius, who perused his history, assures us, that Justus made no mention at all of Jesus Christ. The true writing of these names, Christ and Christians, as in Josephus, is another argument that Tacitus had this account from him; which names he would otherwise most probably, with Suetonius, and other old Romans, have written Chrest and Chrestians. The words of Tacitus are all so very like those of Josephus, that it is most reasonable to conclude they were taken from him, and no other author.

JUSTIN MARTYR.

YOU (Jews) knew that Jesus was risen from the dead, and ascended into heaven, as the prophecies did foretel was to happen.

ORIGEN.

THIS James was so shining a character among the people, on account of his righteousness, that Flavius Josephus, when, in his twenty books of the Jewish Antiquities, he describes the cause why the people suffered such miseries till the sacred temple was demolished, says, that these things befel them through the Divine anger, for what they had dared to do with James, the brother of Jesus, who was called Christ. He says farther, that the people thought they suffered these things for the sake of James.

Josephus testifies, in the 18th book of his Jewish Antiquities, that John was the Baptist, and that he promised purification to those that were baptized. The same Josephus also, when enquiring into the cause cause of the destruction of Jerusalem, and the demolition of the temple, ought to have said, that their inclinations against Jesus were the cause of these miseries coming on the people, because they had slain that Christ who was foretold by the prophets: he, though, as it were, unwillingly, yet, one not remote from the truth, says "These miseries befel the Jews by way of revenge for James the Just, who was the brother of Jesus, that was called Christ; because they had slain him who was a most righteous person." Now this James was he whom that genuine disciple of Jesus, Paul, said he had seen as the Lord's brother, (Gal. i. 19.) which relation implies not so much nearness of blood, or sameness of education, as it does agreement of manners and preaching. If, therefore, he says, the desolation of Jerusalem befel the Jews for the sake of James, with how much greater reason might he have said that it happened for the sake of Jesus? To this Origen adds, Titus destroyed Jerusalem, according to Josephus, on account of James the Just, the brother of Jesus, that was called Christ; but, in truth, on account of Jesus, the Christ of God.

EUSEBIUS.

CERTAINLY the attestation of those I have already produced concerning Our Saviour may be sufficient. However, it may not be amiss, if, over and above, we make use of Josephus, the Jew, as an additional witness. In the 18th book of his Antiquities, where he relates an account of what happened under Pilate, he mentions Our Saviour in these words. "Now there was, about this time, Jesus, a wise man, if it be lawful to call him a man, for he was a doer of wonderful works, a teacher of such men as had a veneration for truth. He drew over to him both many of the Jews, and many of the Gentiles. He was the Christ. And when Pilate, at the suggestion of the principal men among us, had condemned him to the cross, those that loved him at first did not forsake him, for he appeared to them alive again the third day, the Divine prophets had spoken of these and many other wonderful things concerning him. Whence the tribe of Christians, so named from him, are not extinct at this day." If, therefore, we have the testimony of this historian, that he not only brought over to himself the Twelve Apostles, with the Seventy Disciples, but many of the Jews, and many of the Gentiles, he must manifestly have somewhat in him extraordinary above the rest of mankind: for how otherwise could he draw over so many of the Jews and Gentiles, unless he performed admirable and amazing works, and used a method of teaching that was not common? Moreover, the scripture of the Acts of the Apostles bears witness that there were many thousands of Jews who were persuaded that he was the Christ of God, who was foretold by the prophets. Acts xxi. 20.

From Ecclesiastical History, written about the year of our Lord 330.

THE Divine Scripture of the Gospels make mention of John the Baptist as having his head cut off by the younger Herod. Josephus also concurs in this history, and makes mention of Herodias by name, as the wife of his brother, whom Herod had married upon divorcing his former lawful wife. She was the daughter of Aretas, king of Arabia Petraea, and which Herodias he had parted from her husband while he was alive. On this account also Aretas made war with him, because his daughter had been used dishonourably. In which war, when it came to a battle, he says, that all Herod's army was destroyed; and that he suffered this because of his wicked contrivance against John. Moreover this same Josephus, by acknowledging John to have been a most righteous man, and the Baptist, concurs in his testimony with what is written in the Gospels. He also relates, that Herod lost his kingdom for the sake of this same Herodias; together with whom he was himself condemned to be banished to Vienna, a city of Gaul. In the 18th book of his Antiquities, he thus writes of John:

"Some of the Jews thought that the destruction of Herod's army came from God, and that very justly, as a punishment for what he did against John, that was called the Baptist; for Herod slew him, who was a good man, and one that commanded the Jews to exercise virtue, both as to righteousness towards one another, and piety towards God, and so to come to baptism; for that, by this means, the washing with water would appear acceptable to him when they made use of it; not in order to the putting away, or remission of some sins only, but for the purification of the body; supposing still that the soul was thoroughly purified by righteousness. When many came in crowds about him, for they were greatly delighted with hearing his words, Herod was afraid that his great power of persuading men might tend to sedition, for they seemed disposed to do every thing he advised them to. He therefore thought it better to prevent any attempt at innovation by cutting him off, than, after such innovation should be brought about, to repent of such negligence. Accordingly he was sent a prisoner to the castle of Machærus, and there put to death."

When Josephus has thus written, he makes mention of Our Saviour in the same history, in the manner already quoted: therefore as this writer sprung from the Hebrews themselves, he hath delivered these things in his own work concerning John the Baptist, and Our Saviour. What room then can there be for farther evasion?

Now James was so wonderful a person, and so celebrated by all others for righteousness, that the judicious Jews thought this to have been the occasion of the siege of Jerusalem, which came on presently after his martyrdom, and that it befel them for no other reason than that impious fact they were guilty of against him. Josephus, therefore, did not refuse to attest thereto in writing in the following words: "These miseries befel the Jews by way of revenge for James the Just, who was the brother of Jesus, that was called Christ, on this account, that they had slain him who was a most righteous person."

The same Josephus declares the manner of his death in the 20th book of his Antiquities, in these words: "Cæsar sent Albinus into Judæa as procurator, when he heard that Festus was dead. Now Ananus the younger, who had been admitted to the high-priesthood, was, in his temper, bold and daring in an extraordinary manner. He was also of the sect of the Sadducees, who are more rigid in opinion than others of the Jews. Since therefore this was the character of Ananus, he thought he had a proper opportunity to exercise his authority, because Festus was dead, and Albinus was but upon the road. He therefore assembles the Sanhedrim of judges, and brings before them James, the brother of Jesus, who was called Christ, and some others of his companions, and when he had formed an accusation against them as breakers of the law, he delivered them up to be stoned. But those who seemed the most equitable of the citizens, and those who were most uneasy at the breach of the laws, disliked what was done. They also sent to the king (Agrippa) desiring him to send to Ananus, that he should act so no more; for that what he had already done could not be justified."

AMBROSE, OR HEGESIPPUS.

WE have discovered that it was the opinion and belief of the Jews, as Josephus affirms, (who is an author not to be rejected when he writes against himself,) that Herod lost his army, not by the deceit of men, but by the anger of God, and that justly, as an effect of punishment for what he did to John the Baptist.

Baptist, a just man, who had said to him, "It is not lawful for thee to have thy brother's wife."

The Jews themselves also bear witness to Christ, as appears from Josephus, the writer of their history, who says, "That there was at that time a wise man, if it be lawful to call him a man, a doer of wonderful works, who appeared to his disciples, after the third day from his death, alive again, according to the writings of the prophets, who foretold these and innumerable other miraculous events concerning him. From him arose the congregation of Christians, which have penetrated amongst all sorts of men. Nor does there remain a nation in the Roman world that continue strangers to his religion." If the Jews do not believe us, let them at least believe their own writers. Josephus, whom they esteem a very great man, hath said this; he hath spoken truth after such a manner, that is, historical truth, because he held it unlawful to deceive, though he was no believer, which rather confirms than invalidates his testimony.

RUFINUS.

NOW there was at that time Jesus, a wise man, if at least it be lawful to call him a man, for he was a doer of wonderful works, a teacher of such things to those who were willing to hear the truth. He also drew over to him many of the Jews, and many of the Gentiles. He was Christ. And when Pilate, at the accusation of the principal men of our nation, had decreed that he should be crucified, those that had loved him from the beginning did not forsake him; for he appeared to them alive again the third day, according to what the divinely inspired prophets had foretold, that these, and innumerable other, miracles should come to pass about him. Moreover, both the name and sect of Christians, who are denominated from him, continue in being to this day.

HIERONYMUS.

JOSEPHUS, in the 18th book of his Antiquities, most expressly acknowledges, that Christ was slain by the Pharisees on account of the greatness of his miracles; and that John the Baptist was truly a prophet; and that Jerusalem was demolished on account of the slaughter of James the Apostle. He wrote concerning our Lord after this manner. At the same time there was Jesus, a wise man, if yet it be lawful to call him a man, for he was a doer of wonderful works, a teacher of those who willingly receive the truth. He had many followers, both of the Jews and Gentiles. He was believed to be Christ. And when, through the envy of our principal men, Pilate had condemned him to the cross, notwithstanding this, those who had loved him at first persevered; for he appeared to them alive on the third day, as the oracles of the prophets had foretold many of these and other wonderful things concerning him. And the sect of Christians, so named from him, are not extinct at this day.

ISIDORUS PELUSIOTA,

SCHOLAR OF CHRYSOSTOM.

THERE was one Josephus, a Jew of the greatest reputation, and one that was zealous for the law; one also that paraphrased the Old Testament with truth, and acted valiantly for the Jews, and hath shewn that their settlement is nobler than can be described by words. Now since he made their interest give place to truth, for he would not support the opinion of impious men, I think it necessary to set down his words. What then does he say? Now there was about that time Jesus, a wise man, if it be lawful to call him a man, for he was a doer of wonderful works, a teacher of such men as receive the truth with pleasure. He drew over to him both many of the Jews, and many of the Gentiles. He was the Christ. And when Pilate, at the suggestion of the principal men amongst us, had condemned him to the cross, those that loved him at first did not forsake him: for he appeared to them the third day alive again, as the Divine prophets had foretold, with many other wonderful things concerning him. And the tribe of Christians, so named from him, are not extinct at this day. I cannot but admire this man's love of truth in many instances, but chiefly where he says, "Jesus was a teacher of men who received the truth with pleasure."

S O Z O M E N U S.

NOW Josephus, the son of Matthias, a priest, a man of very great note both among the Jews and the Romans, may well be deemed a witness of credit as to the truth of Christ's history; for he scruples to call him a man, as being a doer of wonderful works, and a teacher of the word of truth. He names him Christ openly; and is not ignorant that he was condemned to the cross, and appeared on the third day alive, and that many other wonderful things were foretold of him by the Divine prophets. He testifies also, that those whom he drew over to him, being many of the Gentiles as well as Jews, continued to love him; and that the tribe named from him Christians was not then extinct. He appears likewise to have been so affected by the wonders he performed, as to run in a kind of middle path, so as not to put any indignity upon believers in him, but rather to afford his suffrage to them.

CASSIODORUS.

NOW Josephus, the son of Matthias, a priest, a man of great nobility among the Jews, and of great dignity among the Romans, shall be a witness to the truth of Christ's history; for he dares not call him a man, as a doer of famous works, and a teacher of true doctrines. He names him Christ openly; and is not ignorant that he was condemned to the cross, and appeared on the third day alive, and that an infinite number of other wonderful things were foretold of him by the holy prophets. Moreover, he testifies also, that there were then alive many whom he had chosen, both Greeks and Jews, and that they continued to love him, and that the sect which was named from him was by means extinct at that time.

EPIPHANIUS SCHOLASTICUS

OF JOHN THE BAPTIST.

IT was the opinion of some of the Jews, that Herod's army did therefore perish because the Divine indignation was kindled against him, and that very justly, by way of vengeance for John, who was called the Baptist. For Herod had slain him who was a very good man, and exhorted the Jews to follow virtue, to exercise righteousness, to observe piety towards God, and to unite together by baptism as a thing acceptable, if used, not only for the washing away of sins, but the purification of the soul, and as a kind of seal of all the virtues together. When such precepts were taught by him, and a very great concourse of people flocked to hear him, Herod, fearful lest, by the persuasion of his doctrine, the people should depart from his government, (for he saw that the common people were ready to obey the precepts and admonitions he gave them in all points,) thought it more expedient to prevent any sedition that might arise, by taking him off, than, after disturbances had happened, to repent when it was too late. It was upon this suspicion alone of Herod that John was sent a prisoner to the castle of Machærus, and there beheaded. But, as we before observed, the Jews were of opinion that God had brought destruction upon his army, and thereby inflicted a just punishment on Herod.

Latin version of the Antiquities of Josephus

OF OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST.

NOW there was at that time Jesus, ■ wise man, if at least it be lawful to call him a man, for he was ■ doer of wonderful works, a teacher of such men as willingly heard the truth. He also drew over to him many of the Jews, and many of the Gentiles. He was Christ. And when Pilate, at the accusation of the principal men of our nation, had decreed that he should be crucified, those that loved him from the beginning did not forsake him; for he appeared to them to the third day alive again, according to what the divinely inspired prophets had foretold, that those and innumerable other miracles should come to pass about him. Moreover, both the name and sect of Christians, who were denominated from him, continue in being to this day.

EPIPHANIUS

OF JAMES, THE BROTHER OF OUR LORD.

ANANUS, the high-priest, believing that he had found out ■ proper time to exercise his authority, Festus, the procurator, being dead, and Albinus only upon the road, appointed a council of judges, and bringing several before him, among whom was the brother of Jesus, who is called Christ, whose name was James, he accused them of acting against the law, and delivered them up to be stoned. But those of the citizens that seemed the most moderate, and were concerned to have the law exactly observed, were greatly offended, and sent to the king (Agrippa,) entreating him that he would write to Ananus, that he would desist from such actions as were not well done, &c.

ANASTASIAS ABBAS.

NOW Josephus, a Jewish author, says of Christ, that he was a just and good man, shewn and declared so to be by Divine Grace, who gave aid to many by signs and miracles, FRECULPHUS.

JOSEPHUS, in the 18th book of his Antiquities, most expressly acknowledges that Christ was slain by the Pharisees, on account of the greatness of his miracles; that John the Baptist was truly a prophet; and that Jerusalem was demolished on account of the slaughter of James the Apostle. Nay, he wrote concerning our Lord after this manner: "At that time there was Jesus, ■ wise man, if it be reasonable to call him a man; for he was a doer of wonderful works, and a teacher of those who willingly receive the truth. He had many followers, both of the Jews and Gentiles. He was also believed to be Christ. And when, through the envy of our principal men, Pilate had condemned him to the cross, those who loved him at first persevered. Now he appeared to them on the third day alive, as the oracles of the prophets had foretold many of these and other wonderful things concerning him. And the sect of Christians, so named from him, are not extinct at this day."

JOHANNES MALELA.

FROM that time began the destruction of the Jews, as Josephus, the philosopher of the Hebrews, hath written; who also said this, "that, from the time the Jews crucified Christ, who was ■ good and righteous man, (that is, if it be fit to call such a one ■ man, and not a God,) the land of Judæa was never free from trouble." These things the same Josephus, the Jew, hath related in his writings.

PHOTIUS.

I HAVE read the treatise of Josephus about the universe; the title of which I have elsewhere read to be, of the substance of the universe. It is contained in two very small treatises. He treats of the origin of the world in a brief manner. He speaks, however, of the divinity of Christ in a way much resembling ours, declaring, that the same name of Christ belongs to him; and writes concerning him, in general, in ■ manner that cannot be justly censured. The phraseology of this treatise does not at all differ from his other works. Besides, others have written on the same subject.

Herod, the Tetrarch of Galilee, and of Peræa, the son of Herod the Great, fell in love, ■ Josephus says, with the wife of his brother Herod, whose name was Herodias, the grand-daughter of Herod the Great, by his son Aristobulus, whom he had slain. Agrippa was also her brother. Now Herod took her away from her husband, and married her. This is he that slew John the Baptist, that great man, the forerunner of Christ, being afraid (as Josephus says) lest he should raise a sedition among his people; for they all followed the directions of John, on account of the excellency of his virtue.

MACARIUS.

JOSEPHUS, a priest of Jerusalem, and one that wrote with truth the history of the Jewish affairs, bears witness that Christ was incarnate and crucified, and the third day rose again, whose writings are deposited in the public library. Since, therefore, the writer of the Hebrews hath given this testimony concerning Our Lord and Saviour in his own books, what defence can there remain for unbelievers?

SUIDAS.

WE have found Josephus, who hath written about the taking of Jerusalem, (of whom Eusebius makes frequent mention in his Ecclesiastical History,) saying openly, in his memoirs of the captivity, that Jesus officiated in the temple with the priests. This we have found Josephus saying, a man of ancient times, and not very long after the apostles, &c.

SOPHRONIUS.

JOSEPHUS, the Jew, that lover of truth, speaks of the forerunner of Christ, and of Our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. In the 18th book of his Antiquities, he openly acknowledges, that Christ was slain by the Jews on account of the greatness of his miracles; and that John the Baptist was truly a prophet; and that Jerusalem was demolished on account of the slaughter of James the apostle.

CEDRENU S.

JOSEPHUS does, indeed, write concerning John the Baptist as follows: "Some of the Jews thought that the destruction of Herod's army came from God, and that he was punished very justly for the punishment he had inflicted on John, that was called the Baptist; for Herod slew him that was a good man, and exhorted the Jews to exercise virtue, both by righteousness towards one another, and piety towards God, and so to come to baptism." But as concerning Christ, the same Josephus says, "That, about that time, there was Jesus, ■ wise man, if it be lawful to call him ■ man, for he was a doer of wonderful works, and ■ teacher of such men as receive the truth with pleasure; for that Christ drew over many even from the Gentiles, whom, when Pilate had crucified, those who at first loved him, did not leave off to preach concerning him; for he appeared appeared to them the third day alive again, as the Divine prophets had testified, and spoken these and other wonderful things concerning him.

We will produce Josephus himself for a witness, who was one of the sect of the Jews. Consider the love of truth that was in this man, who, although he were a Jew, yet he did not permit himself to follow the Jewish evasions and falsehoods.

THEOPHYLACTUS.

THE city of the Jews was taken, and the wrath of God was kindled against them: as also Josephus witnesses that this came upon them on account of the death of James.

ALEXANDRIAN CHRONICLE.

JOSEPHUS relates, in the 18th book of his Antiquities, that John the Baptist, that holy man, was beheaded at the instigation of Herodias, the wife of Philip. For Herod had divorced his former wife, who was still alive, and had been his lawful wife. She was the daughter of Aretas, king of Arabia Petrea. When, therefore, Herod had taken Herodias away from her husband, while he was yet alive, (on whose account he slew John,) Aretas made war against him because his daughter had been dishonourably treated. In this war, he says, that all Herod's army was destroyed; and that he suffered that calamity because of the wickedness he had been guilty of against John. The same Josephus relates, that Herod lost his kingdom on account of Herodias, and that with her he was banished, &c.

Now that Our Saviour taught and preached three years is demonstrated both by other reasonings, as also out of the Holy Gospels, and out of the writings of Josephus, who was a wise man among the Hebrews, &c.

Josephus, in the 18th book of the Jewish Antiquities, writes, that, after Annas, there were three high-priests, Ishmael, the son of Baphi, and Eleazar, the son of Ananus, and Simon, the son of Camathus, &c.

Josephus also relates, in the 7th book of the Jewish War, that Jerusalem was taken in the second year of Vespasian, and many years after they had dared to put Jesus to death: in which time he says, that James, the brother of Our Lord, and bishop of Jerusalem, was thrown down from the temple, and slain by stoning.

ZONARAS.

THERE also you have an abridgment of all that Josephus wrote concerning Our Saviour Jesus Christ and John the Baptist.

Josephus wrote thus concerning this John, that Herod slew him who was a good man, and exhorted the Jews to exercise virtue, both as to righteousness towards one another, and piety towards God, and so to come to baptism; for by that means the washing with water would be acceptable to him. Now Herod, who feared lest the great influence John had over the people might put it in his power to raise a rebellion, (for they seemed ready to do any thing he should advise,) thought it best, by putting him to death, to prevent any mischief he might cause, and not to bring himself into difficulties by sparing a man who might make him repent of it when it should be too late. Accordingly he was sent a prisoner, out of Herod's suspicion, to Machærus, and there put to death. Now the Jews had an opinion that the destruction of the army was sent as a punishment upon Herod, and a mark of God's displeasure to him.

About this time also did Our Lord Jesus Christ appear in Judæa, concerning whom Josephus, in No. 45.

the 18th book of his Antiquities, says thus: "Now there was about this time a wise man, it is lawful to call him a man, for he was a doer of wonderful works, a teacher of such men as receive the truth with pleasure. He drew over to him many of the Jews and many of the Gentiles. He was the Christ. And when Pilate, at the suggestion of the principal men among us, had condemned him to the cross, those that loved him at first did not forsake him; for he appeared to them the third day alive again, as the Divine prophets had said these and many other wonderful things concerning him. And the tribe of Christians, so named from him, are not extinct at this day." These things Josephus wrote in his Antiquities concerning Christ.

Johannes Sariburienfis, Petrus Comestor, Gorfridus Viterbienfis, and Vincentius Bellowacensis, all add their testimonies concerning Josephus in words to the same effect.

GLYCAS.

THEN did Philo and Josephus flourish. The last was styled the lover of truth, because he commended John, who baptized our Lord, and because he bore witness that Christ, in like manner, was a wise man, and the doer of great miracles, and that after he was crucified he appeared the third day.

NICEPHORUS CALLISTUS.

NOW this (concerning Herod the Tetrarch) is attested to, not only by the book of the Holy Gospels, but by Josephus, that lover of truth, who also makes mention of Herodias, his brother's wife, whom Herod had taken from him, while he was alive, and married, having divorced his former lawful wife, who was the daughter of Aretas, king of Arabia Petrea. On whose account also, when he had slain John the Baptist, Aretas made war upon him, because his daughter had been dishonourably used. In which war he relates, that all Herod's army was destroyed, and that he suffered this on account of the most unjust slaughter of John. He also adds, that John was a most righteous man. Moreover, he makes mention of his baptism, agreeing in all points thereto relating to the gospel. He also informs us, that Herod lost his kingdom on account of Herodias, with whom also he was condemned to be banished to Vienna, which was their place of exile, a city bordering upon Gaul, and lying near the utmost bounds of the west. However, in the 18th book of his Antiquities, he says this farther concerning John. "Some of the Jews thought the destruction of Herod's army came from God, and that very justly, as a punishment for what he did against John, that was called the Baptist. For Herod slew him who was a good man, and one that exhorted the Jews to exercise virtue and piety towards God, and so to come to baptism, as by that means the washing with water would appear acceptable to him, when they used it not for the putting away of some sins only, but for the purification of the body, supposing still that the soul be thoroughly purified beforehand by righteousness. Now when many others came in crowds about him, (for they were greatly moved by hearing his words,) Herod was afraid that his great power of persuasion might tend to sedition, for they seemed disposed to do every thing he should advise them to. He supposed it better to prevent any attempt at innovation from him by cutting him off, than that such change should be brought about, and the public suffered to repent of that negligence. Accordingly he was sent a prisoner, out of Herod's suspicious temper, to the castle of Machærus, and there slain." This is also the account of Josephus.

This writer concurs with the foregoing in his testimony of Josephus concerning Our Saviour Jesus Christ.

HARDMANNUS SCHEDELIUS.

JOSEPHUS, the Jew, who was called Flavius, a priest, and the son of Matthias, a priest of that nation, a most celebrated historian, and very skilful in many things, was certainly a good man, of excellent character, and one who had the highest opinion of Christ.

P L A T I N A.

I SHALL avoid mentioning what Christ did, until the thirtieth year of his age, when he was baptized by John, the son of Zacharias; because not only the Gospels and Epistles are full of those acts which he performed in the most excellent manner, but such books as are quite remote from his way of living and acting. Flavius Josephus himself, who wrote twenty books of Jewish Antiquities in the Greek language, when he had proceeded as far as the Emperor Tiberius, says, "There was, in those days, Jesus, a certain wise man, if at least it be lawful to call him a man, for he was a doer of wonderful works, and a teacher of men, especially of such as willingly hear the truth. On this account he drew over to him many, both of the Jews and Gentiles. He was Christ. But when Pilate, instigated by the principal men of our nation, had decreed that he should be crucified, yet did not those that loved him from the beginning forsake him. Besides, he appeared to them, the third day after his death, alive, as the divinely inspired prophets had foretold, that these and many other miracles should come to pass about him. And the famous name of Christians taken from him, as well as their sect, do still continue in being.

The same Josephus also affirms, that John the Baptist was a true prophet, and on that account esteemed by men in general; that he was slain by Herod, the son of Herod the Great, a little before the death of Christ, in the castle of Machærus; and that this cruel order was given by Herod at the instigation of Herodias, the sister of Agrippa, and the wife of his brother Philip, whom he had incestuously married.

TRITHEMIUS, THE ABBOT.

JOSEPHUS, the Jew, although he continued to be a Jew, did frequently commend the Christians, and, in the 18th book of his Antiquities, wrote down an eminent testimony concerning Our Lord Jesus Christ.

Whether Trithemius found more passages concerning the Christians in his copies of the genuine works of Josephus now or formerly extant, or ascribed the book concerning the universe to him, and therein met with other commendations of the Christians that were in his genuine works, cannot now be determined. So far, however, is plain, that this very learned abbot, who affirms that Josephus frequently commended the Christians, had more testimonies, in the works he believed to be Josephus's, to this purpose, than we are at present acquainted with. Which seems to have been the case of Origen, Eusebius, the author of the Alexandrian Chronicle, Suidas, and Theophylactus, as appears in our quotations out of them.

More quotations from the most respectable writers might be adduced, such as the Latin Version from Haimo, Anonymus Bambergensis, Conradus Urspergensis, Albertus Stadenfis, &c. &c. mentioned by Fabricius, all which authors cite the same testimony concerning Christ; but as we presume those already quoted are sufficient to satisfy the candid and impartial reader, we pass them over to obviate a tedious prolixity.

OBSERVATIONS

FOREGOING EVIDENCES

AND

I.

THE style of all these original testimonies belonging to Josephus is exactly the style of the same Josephus, and especially his style about those parts of his Antiquities wherein we find these testimonies. His testimonies concerning John the Baptist and James the Just, have been rendered equally undeniable as that concerning Christ.

II.

THE clauses in Josephus concerning John the Baptist and James the Just, especially those in all our present copies, as well as those cited from their copies by the ancients, are plainly and undeniably genuine. One writer seems desirous of setting aside that concerning John the Baptist, though expressly quoted by Origen himself out of Josephus; but since he hardly produces any thing like an argument to support his pretence, I shall take no farther notice of it.

III.

THESE testimonies therefore, being confessedly and undeniably written by Josephus himself, it is next to impossible that he should wholly omit some testimony concerning Jesus Christ. Nay, while his testimonies of John the Baptist, and of James the Just, are so honourable, and give them such respectable characters, his testimony of Christ can be no other than very honourable, or such as afforded him a still greater character. Could the very same author, who gave so full and advantageous a character of John the Baptist, the forerunner of Jesus of Nazareth, (all whose disciples were by him directed to that Jesus of Nazareth as to the true Messiah, and all whose disciples became afterwards his disciples,) omit to speak honourably of that Jesus of Nazareth himself? and this in the history of those very times in which he was born, lived, and died? This is almost incredible.

Further; could the very same author, who gave so advantageous a character of James the Just, and this under the very appellation of James, the brother of Jesus, who was called Christ, which James was one of the principal disciples, or apostles, of this Jesus Christ, and had been many years the only Christian bishop of the believing Jews of Judæa and Jerusalem, in the very days, and in the very country of this writer; could he, I say, wholly omit, nay, could he withhold, a very honourable account of Jesus Christ himself, whose disciple and bishop this James most undoubtedly was? This is also almost incredible.

IV.

THE famous clause in this testimony of Josephus concerning Christ, "This was Christ, or the Christ," clearly points out that this Jesus was distinguished from all others of that name, of which there were not a few, as mentioned by Josephus himself, by the addition of the other name of Christ; or that this person was no other than he whom all the world knew by the name of Jesus Christ, and his followers by the name of Christians.

V.

THOUGH Josephus did not design here to declare himself openly a Christian, yet he could not possibly believe all that he asserts concerning Jesus Christ, unless he were so far a Christian as the Jewish Nazarenes, or Ebionites, then were, who believed Jesus of Nazareth to be the true Messiah, without believing that he was more than a man; who also believed the necessity of the observance of the ceremonial law of Moses, in order to salvation for all mankind; which were the two main points of those Jewish Christians faith, though in opposition to all the apostles of Jesus Christ in the first century, and in opposition to the whole Catholic Church of Christ in the following centuries. It seems then to appear that Josephus was, in his own mind and conscience, only a Nazarene, or Ebionite Jewish Christian; and it is observable, that his entire testimony, and all that he says of John the Baptist and of James, as well as his his absolute silence about all the rest of the apostles, exactly agrees with him under that character, and no other. We all know that the thousands of Jews who believed in Christ (Acts xxi. 20.) in the first century, were all zealous of the ceremonial law; and by consequence, if there were any reason to think our Josephus to be, in any sense, a believer or a Christian, as from these testimonies there are very great ones, all these, and all other reasons, could not but conspire to assure us he was no other than a Nazarene, or Ebionite Christian.

VI.

SINCE therefore Josephus appears to have been, in his own mind and conscience, no other than a Nazarene, or Ebionite Christian, and by consequence with them rejected all our Greek gospels and Greek books of the New Testament, and received only the Hebrew gospel of the Nazarenes, or Ebionites, we ought also to have that Nazarene or Ebionite gospel, with the other Nazarene or Ebionite fragments in view, when we consider any passages of Josephus relating to Christ, or to Christianity. Thus, since that gospel omitted all that is in the beginning of our St. Matthew's and St. Luke's gospels, and began with the ministry of John the Baptist, in which first parts of the gospel history are the accounts of the slaughter of the infants, and of the emolument or taxation under Augustus Cæsar and Herod, it is no matter of wonder that Josephus has not taken care particularly and clearly to preserve those histories.

Thus when we find that Josephus calls James, the brother of Christ, by the name of James the Just, and describes him as a most just or righteous man in an especial manner, we are to remember, that such is his name and character in the gospel according to the Hebrews, and the other Ebionite remains of Hegesippus, but no where else.

Nor are we to suppose they herein referred to any other than that righteousness which was by the Jewish law, wherein St. Paul, (Philip. iii. 6.) before he embraced Christianity, professed himself to have been blameless. Thus when Josephus, with other Jews, ascribed the miseries of that nation under Vespasian and Titus, with the destruction of Jerusalem, to the barbarous murder of James the Just, we must remember what we learn from the Ebionite fragments of Hegesippus, that these Ebionites interpreted a prophecy of Isaiah, as foretelling this very murder, and the consequent miseries: "Let us take away the just one, for he is unprofitable to us; therefore shall they eat the fruit of their own ways."

Thus when Josephus says, as we have seen, that the most equitable citizens of Jerusalem, and those that were most zealous of the law, were very uneasy at the condemnation of this James, and some of his friends, or fellow Christians, by the high-priest and sanhedrim, and declares that he himself was one of those Jews who thought the shocking calamities of that nation effects of the Divine vengeance for the murder of this James, we may easily see those opinions could only be the opinions of converted Jews or Ebionites. The high-priest and sanhedrim, who always persecuted the Christians, and the body of those unbelieving Jews who are supposed to suffer for murdering this James, could not surely be of that opinion. Thus lastly, when Josephus is cited in Suidas, as affirming that Jesus officiated with the priests in the temple, this account is by no means disagreeable to the pretensions of the Ebionites; Hegesippus, the Ebionite, affirming the very same thing of James the Just.

I have already made some observations on the famous testimony concerning our Saviour in Josephus from Tacitus. The next author I have alledged for it is Justin Martyr, one so nearly cœval with Josephus, that he might be born about the time when he wrote his Antiquities. Justin elsewhere appeals to the same Antiquities by that very name; and though he does not here directly quote them, yet does he seem to me to allude to this very testimony in them concerning our Saviour, when he affirms, in this place, to Trypho, the Jew, that "his nation originally knew that Jesus was risen from the dead, and ascended into heaven, as the prophecies did foretel was to happen." Nor, indeed, does he seem to me to have any thing else particularly in his view, but those clauses of this very testimony, where Josephus says, that "Jesus appeared to his followers alive the third day after his crucifixion, as the Divine prophets had foretold these and other wonderful things concerning him." I must leave this application to the impartial reader's own consideration.

The next author I have quoted for Josephus's testimonies of John the Baptist, of Jesus of Nazareth, and of James the Just, is Origen, who is, indeed, allowed, on all hands, to have quoted him for his excellent characters of John the Baptist, and of James the Just; but whose supposed silence about this testimony concerning Christ, is usually alledged as the principal argument against its being genuine; and particularly to the clause "This was the Christ;" and that, as we have seen, because he twice assures us that, in his opinion, Josephus did not himself acknowledge Jesus for Christ. As to this latter clause I have to observe, that Josephus did not here, in writing to Greeks and Romans, mean any such thing by these words as Jews and Christians naturally understand by them. I have also to observe, that all the ancients allow still, with Origen, that Josephus did not, in the Jewish and Christian sense, acknowledge Jesus for the true Messiah, or the true Christ of God, notwithstanding their express quotation of that clause in Josephus as genuine. So that unless we suppose Origen to have had a different notion of these words from all the other ancients, we cannot conclude from this assertion, that he had not those words in his copy. However, it seems to me, that Origen affords us four several indications that the main parts, at least, of this testimony itself were in his copy.

1st. When Origen introduces the testimony of Josephus concerning James the Just, that he thought the miseries of the Jews were an instance of the Divine vengeance on that nation for putting James to death instead of Jesus, he uses an expression no way necessary to his purpose, nor occasioned by any words of Josephus there; I mean that they had slain "That Christ which was foretold in the prophecies." Whence could that expression come into Origen's mind, when he was quoting a testimony from Josephus concerning the brother of Christ, from his remembrance of a clause in the testimony of the same Josephus concerning Christ himself, that "the prophets had foretold his death and resurrection, and many other wonderful things concerning him?"

2dly. Why was Origen so surprized at Josephus's ascribing the destruction of Jerusalem to the Jews murdering of James the Just, and not to their murdering of Jesus, as we have seen he was, if he had not known that Josephus had spoken of Jesus and his death before; and that he had a very good opinion of Jesus, which yet he could learn in no way so authentic as from this testimony? Nor do the words he uses, that Josephus was "remote from the truth," perhaps allude to any thing else but this very testimony before us.

3dly. How came Origen, upon a slight occasion, when he had just set down that testimony of Josephus concerning James the Just, the brother of Jesus, who was called Christ, to say, that "It may be questioned whether the Jews thought Jesus to be a man, or whether they did not suppose him to be a being of a diviner kind?" This appears so very like those clauses of this testimony in Josephus, that "Jesus was a wise man, if it be lawful to call him a man," that it is highly probable Origen thereby alluded to them. And this is the more to be depended on, because all the unbelieving Jews, and all the rest of the Nazarene Jews, esteemed Jesus, with with one consent, as a mere man, the son of Joseph and Mary; and it is not, I think, possible to produce any one Jew, but Josephus, who says any thing like his being more than human, or, according to the import of his words, a "Divine person." I take this argument to be a very forcible one, but submit it to the consideration of the judicious.

4. Why does Origen affirm twice so expressly, that "Josephus did not himself own, in the Jewish and Christian sense, that Jesus was Christ," notwithstanding his quotations out of him are eminent testimonies for John the Baptist, his forerunner, and for James the Just, his brother, and one of his principal disciples? There is no passage in all Josephus so likely to persuade Origen of this, as in the famous testimony before us; wherein, as he and all the ancients understood it, he was called Christ, the common name whence the sect of Christians was derived; and where he all along speaks of those Christians, as a sect then in being, whose author was a wonderful person, and his followers great lovers of him and of truth, yet as such a sect as he had not joined himself to. Nor can I devise any other reason but this, and parallel language of Josephus elsewhere, when he speaks of James, or the brother, not of Jesus who was Christ, but of Jesus who was called Christ, that could so naturally induce Origen and others to be of that opinion.

IX.

AS to that great critic Photius, in the ninth century, who is supposed not to have had this testimony in his copy of Josephus, or else to have esteemed it spurious, because in his extracts from the Antiquities of Josephus it is not expressly mentioned, I cannot withhold surprize that a section, which had been cited out of the copies of Josephus all along, before the days of Photius, as well as it has been all along cited out of them since his days, should be supposed not to be in his copy, because he does not directly mention it in certain short and imperfect extracts, no way particularly relating to such matters. Those who lay a stress on this silence of Photius, seem to have attended little to the nature and brevity of those extracts. They contain little or nothing, as he in effect professes at their entrance, but what concerns Antipater, Herod the Great, his brethren and family, with their exploits, till the days of Agrippa the younger, and Cumanus, governor of Judæa, fifteen years after the death of Our Saviour; without one word of Pilate, or what happened under his government, which yet was the only proper place in which this testimony could come to be mentioned. However, since Photius seems therefore, as we have seen, to suspect the treatise of the universe ascribed by some to Josephus, because it speaks highly of the divinity of Christ, this bears a great resemblance of his knowledge and belief of somewhat real in the same Josephus, that spoke of him in an inferior manner, which could hardly be any other passage than this testimony before us. And since, as we have also seen, when he speaks of the Jewish history of Justus of Tiberias, as infected with the prejudices of the Jews, in taking no manner of notice of the advent, the acts and the miracles of Jesus Christ, while yet he never once speaks thus of Josephus himself, this most naturally implies also, that there was not the like occasion here as there; but that Josephus had not wholly omitted that advent, those acts or miracles, which yet he has done every where else, in the books seen by Photius, as well as Justus of Tiberias, but in this famous testimony before us. So that it is most probable, Photius not only had this testimony in his copy, but also believed it to be genuine.

X.

AS to the silence of Clement of Alexandria, who cites the Antiquities of Josephus, but never cites any of the testimonies now before us, it cannot be deemed a matter of wonder, since he never cites Josephus but once, and that for a point of chronology only; to determine how many years had passed from the days of Moses to the days of Josephus; so that his silence may almost as well be alledged against an hundred other remarkable passages in Josephus as against these before us.

XI.

NOR does the like silence of Tertullian imply that these testimonies, or any of them, were not in the copies of his age. Tertullian never once hints at any treatises of Josephus, but those against Apion, and that in general only for a point of chronology. Nor does it any where appear that Tertullian ever saw any of the writings of Josephus besides; and it is far from certain that he ever saw these. He had particular occasion, in his dispute with the Jews, to quote Josephus above any other writer, to prove the completion of the prophecies of the Old Testament in the destruction of Jerusalem, and the miseries of the Jews at that time, of which he there discourses; yet does he never once quote him upon that solemn occasion. So that it rather seems that Tertullian never read the Greek Antiquities of Josephus, nor his Greek books of the Jewish Wars. Nor is this at all strange in Tertullian, a Latin writer, that lived in Africa; by none of which African writers is there any one clause that I know of cited out of any of the writings of Josephus. Nor is it worth while, in such numbers of positive citations, to mention the silence of other later writers, as being here of very small consequence.

To conclude, the most doubtful of all these testimonies, as has been of late supposed, I mean that concerning Our Saviour Christ, is attested to for genuine, as we have seen by the plain reference of Tacitus, by the probable reference of Justin Martyr, about the middle of the second century; by the more probable reference of Origen, about the middle of the third; by a double express citation of it by Eusebius, in the former part of the fourth; by a loose version of it out of Josephus, by Ambrose, or Hegesippus, soon after it in the same century; by the express Latin transcript made by Rufinus, in his version of the Ecclesiastical History; by another express Latin version of it out of Josephus, by Hieronymus, or Jerome; and a Greek version of that Latin version; and by his learned friend Sophronius; all three about the end of the fourth, or beginning of the fifth, century.

We have it also set down by Isidorus of Pelusium, the scholar of Chrysostom, and Sogemenus, the ecclesiastical historian, both early in the fifth century. Cassiodorus also, and his friend, supposed to be Epiphanius Scholasticus, gives us two Latin versions of it early in the sixth century. We have the same testimony plainly, though briefly, cited by Anastasius, the abbot, in the eighth century. We have Jerome's version of it repeated by Freculphus Lexeviensis; the whole set down in Greek by Hamartolus, and by one Macarius, both in or about the ninth century; besides the imperfect copy of part of it, by Malcla, the chronologer, and the probable allusion to it by Photius, both in the same ninth century. We have Sophronius's Greek version of Jerome's Latin version repeated by Suidas, about the tenth century. We have an almost compleat copy of it given us by Cedrenus, in the eleventh century. We have a still more compleat copy of it given us by Zonaras, the substance of it, three copies of Rufinus's Latin version out of the Greek of Eusebius, by Joannes Sariberriensis, Gotfridy Viterbiensis, and Petrus Comestor, all in the twelfth century. We have another copy of Rufinus's Latin version, by Vicentius Bellovacensis, in the thirteenth century. We have a compleat copy of it in Nicophorus Callistus, in the fourteenth century. We have also a clear reference to it in Hardmanorus Schedelius, and a new Latin version of it in Platina, and a full reference to it in Trithemius, the learned abbot, in the fifteenth century; all which evidence has been produced at large. To say nothing of the old Latin version, as repeated by Hai- in the ninth, and Cenradus Uripergenfis, and Albertus Albertus Stadenfis, in the thirteenth century, which, though not transcribed, are to be esteemed real confirmations of all the former allegations. This, we have abundantly proved, has been the case of this testimony, in all the past ages of Christianity, and in all the several countries of Europe, during the first fifteen centuries of the church.

There is also another argument in favour of the authenticity of this testimony, belonging to all the past ages, which is usually overlooked by learned Christians, though I think it no inconsiderable one, and that is the contempt all the unbelieving Jews have ever shewn for Josephus, the best historian, beyond dispute, which their nation ever produced after the sacred ones. What can be the reason of this contempt of the genuine Greek Josephus? What the foundation of the fallacious pretence that the Hebrew Josephus was not the genuine Josephus, unless it were the testimonies now under consideration, and especially that concerning Jesus Christ, which bears so hard upon the unbelieving Jewish nation, as could not be endured by them? This must appear to the impartial world the principal cause of their rejecting this excellent author; nor can I devise any other probable cause for this rejection; which, if admitted as the true reason, the authenticity of these testimonies, and especially of that concerning Jesus Christ, will of course also be admitted to be wholly undeniable.

Nor are we entirely destitute of evidence, that, when this testimony had been inserted in a manuscript of Josephus in Hebrew, whether it were in an Hebrew version of his Antiquities, or in a later Hebrew epitome, some Jews caused it to be erased out of it. For see Itigius's Prolegomena, and Dr. Cave's Historia Literaria, Vol. II. under the particular of Josephus. Thus far concerning the first fifteen centuries before printing began.

Since printing began, we find this testimony, I think, in every edition, and in every version of Josephus, in all languages. Nay, since Gifanius and Osiander started that question in the 16th century, and Tanquil Faber first wrote against it in the 17th century, all the remaining manuscripts of Josephus, Eusebius, &c. &c. have been carefully looked into and examined, and every one of them have been found to contain this testimony, and almost every one to contain it in its proper place, under the government of Pilate, and that without any considerable variations. Nor do we discover that any ancient author, from the days of Josephus to those of Gifanius, pretended that he knew of any copies in any language without it, nor give us the least reason to suppose they suspected it, or esteemed it as any otherwise than an authority truly certain and undeniable. To this must be added the high probability there is, from the undisputed testimonies about John the Baptist and James the Just, that Josephus must have given us some such testimony concerning Christ, and the very great probability there is that Josephus's own private opinion was that of the Nazarene, or Ebionite Jewish Christian, with which character it very well agrees in every circumstance. Since, therefore, this is no other than the true state of the case, I think every upright judge, that considers it, must declare, that this testimony is not only evidently and undeniably genuine, but, upon the whole, as fully so as any other clauses or sections in the works of Josephus now extant.

It will also here be but reasonable to vindicate Josephus in a point wherein some late writers have dealt very hardly with him, I mean when they accuse him as flattering Vespasian with being the true Messiah of the Jews. We shall take the two passages upon which the accusation is built in Josephus's own words. The former is in the 6th book of his History of the Jewish Wars, and runs thus: "If these things are duly considered, it will be found that God exercises his providence over mankind, and by many means discovers to them beforehand what is for their preservation, but that they perish by their own folly, and their misfortunes are voluntary. For the Jews made the temple four square, by the demolition of the Tower of

"Antonia, while they had it written in their own oracles, that their city, and the sacred house, should be taken, when the temple should become four square. But what chiefly excited them to the war, was an ambiguous oracle, that a certain person would arise about that time out of their country, who should have dominion over the world. This they took to refer to themselves, and many of their wise men were deceived by that determination; while the oracle designed the dominion of Vespasian, who was proclaimed emperor when he was in Judæa."

The other passage is in Josephus's own speech to Vespasian, in the third book of the same history. "You have now in hand Josephus a prisoner, and your present view perhaps extends no farther; but I come to you as a messenger of greater things. Had it not been for this commission, I could not have been here at present, contrary to the duty of a Jewish general, alive in the hands of an enemy. Wherefore am I to be sent to Nero, when Vespasian himself is so near the empire, that I can hardly distinguish betwixt Vespasian and the emperor, or Cæsar? Besides, his son Titus is to come after him. Keep me close as you please, provided I may be Vespasian's prisoner, who is not only my master, but in effect Lord of the Universe. This is what I have in charge to deliver; and whenever I shall be found to use the Divine authority to countenance a fraud, make an example of me."

Now in all this we have not one word of those predictions relating to the Messiah, which Josephus, in his famous testimony concerning Christ, declares to be very numerous; but of one only concerning the taking of Jerusalem, and the holy house, when the temple should become four square; and one only which foretold, that about that time a very great potentate should arise out of Judæa. This last prediction the other wise men then interpreted as one of Jewish extraction; but Josephus of Vespasian, who was first proclaimed emperor when he was in Judæa, without the least intimation that he thought him to be the Messiah of the Jews. All the Jews, with one consent, ever expected that their Messiah was not only to arise in Judæa, and that of Jewish parents in general, but to be of the seed of David, and of the town of Bethlehem, where David was to be a great prophet like Moses, and to come peculiarly for the salvation, and not the destruction of Israel, with many other characters entirely inconsistent with Vespasian. To what particular oracles or predictions Josephus referred is hard to determine, since he does not name them. I suppose, with Reland, that the first of them might be Dan. ix. 26, 27, as then read and interpreted by the Jews; as also that the second was no other than the famous prophecy of Balaam, that "a star should arise out of Jacob, and a sceptre out of Israel, &c. Num. xxiv. 17, 18, 19; Josephus ever looking on Balaam as a true prophet.

It will also be necessary here to vindicate the same Josephus from another imputation, which hath been laid upon him, viz. that when, in his second book against Apion, he makes a comparison between Moses, the Jewish legislator, and Minos, with other old heathen legislators, he insinuates, "that though Moses artfully pretended to a Divine revelation for the laws he gave the Israelites, as did the others as to their own laws, yet that this was only in the way of a pious fraud, and that he did not himself believe that any such Divine revelation was made to him."

This is I suppose a new hypothesis, that our Josephus, after all his zeal for Moses, and for the Mosaic laws, should still believe him to be no better than a direct cheat and impostor. And as I suppose this hypothesis to be entirely new, so do I venture to affirm, and that upon no small acquaintance with the writings of Josephus, that the hypothesis is entirely false, and entirely contrary to the whole drift and tenor of Josephus in all his works.

Josephus begins his Antiquities with this most true

true and useful observation, that Moses did not act as did the heathen sages; he did not found a government on human contrivance, to be guided by political maxims, but laid his foundation on the belief of the being, attributes, and providence of the one true God, the Creator and governor of the whole world, and in the fear of that God being deeply impressed on the minds of the Israelites, through a persuasion that he gave them the laws by which they were to be governed, and that in consequence, those, and only those would be miserable who broke them, and were under his displeasure.

Our historian always appears to give firm credit to the most difficult parts of the sacred books, and assures you every Jew was brought up in that profound veneration for them, and that they were always ready to yield up their lives rather than contradict them. He still gives his assent to the fall of Adam, to the translations of Enoch and Elijah, to the deluge of Noah, to the long lives of the patriarchs, to the burning of Sodom, &c. as those accounts stand in the sacred writings; as also to the scripture prophecies, when they frequently occur, with the observation of their constant competitions all along afterwards, even down to his own time. He pleads the accuracy of the prophet Daniel's predictions, as compared with their completions, and wonders how the Epicureans can bear up against such evidence for a Divine Providence. He thinks Moses so fully inspired, that he takes the account in Deuteronomy of his death, and unknown place of his burial, not to have been added by others afterwards, as expositors since have done, but written by himself prophetically before-hand. He frequently declares his belief in good and bad angels, or demons, and their concern with mankind; as also in divine and prophetic dreams, sometimes afforded eminent persons; and professes to have had such dreams or divine communications himself; of which we have produced a remarkable example about Vespasian's succession to the Roman empire, before any in Judæa knew the death of Nero himself, much less of the successions and deaths of Galba, Otho, and Vitellius, who came between them; the truth of which is also fully attested by Suetonius and Dio, the heathen historians. He has given us a large and valuable collection of the most ancient and authentic heathen testimonies, strongly confirming the truth and divinity of the sacred books of the Old Testament, which he was enabled to do by the vast number of ancient Pagan writers which he perused and quoted. He had, indeed, contrary to the body of his own nation, most liberal notions as to freedom of enquiry among all sects whatsoever; was utterly averse to all tyranny, persecution, and oppression of mankind; and was for giving all sober men of every party liberty to think freely, and speak freely, for themselves, as they thought proper, without taking offence at one another. Yet do his sentiments always go along with the sacred books and the sacred history. Nay, what is most of all remarkable, this was all said and done by Josephus under the most unpromising circumstances of himself and his nation possible; or, when Jerusalem, with its temple, and temple worship, were utterly destroyed, and when he himself was become a captive at Rome, under idolaters. At this very time he firmly retained his faith in God, in Moses, and in the prophets; and even then said plainly, that Daniel, the Jewish prophet, had long ago foretold that destruction of Jerusalem, by the Romans, which he saw; as did Jesus of Nazareth interpret that prophet also; Matt. xxiv. 15. Mark xiii. 14. Nay, he farther intimated to observing readers, that the Messiah of the Jews, (or Jesus of Nazareth,) the stone cut out of the mountain in the same prophet, would, in time, break that Roman monarchy in pieces, and set up a better kingdom, which should endure for ever.

If any are still offended with Josephus's frequent permission of his heathen readers to determine as they should think proper concerning many of those miracles which he relates from the Jewish Scriptures; if he himself therefore doubted of their truth and reality, which has been, and may be, a common objection against him, I must beg liberty to adduce, in his vindication, the very opposite words of the faithful, accurate, and judicious Reland, who has the following note upon one of Josephus's remarkable expressions of this nature, I mean that concerning the miraculous passage of the Israelites over the Red Sea. The expression is, "Let every one judge and determine as he pleases;" and this is the note:

"Josephus (says Reland) does not, by this way of speaking, signify that he doubted whether what was said of the passage of the Israelites through the Red Sea were true or not, but he only uses these words in writing to Gentiles, that if this appeared incredible to them, they might enjoy their own liberty of belief, and not be thereby deterred from reading farther what he was to deliver; for that he himself did not doubt of this is sufficiently apparent from the manner of his narration, and from his own testimony, that he took it out of the sacred volumes. He uses the same expression after he had said, that it was falsely believed that Moses and the Israelites were expelled Egypt for leprosy. It is therefore to be inferred, that he intended to suggest this also was uncertain? This is no other than the very calumny which Josephus himself confutes and exposes in his first book against Apion. He thus speaks, when he relates the ascent of Moses to Mount Sinai; and with the same conclusion ends his third book of Antiquities, where he treats of the divinity of the laws of Moses. He also uses the same words where he relates the age of Noah which he did in the first book, and produces examples from prophane history, that the thing may appear more probable to the Gentiles. In fine, he uses this expression on divers other occasions.

— But while he is so frequently wont to introduce this phrase, or mode of speaking, in his books of Antiquities, I do not remember that I have once met with them in his books of the Jewish Wars. I apprehend the cause of his so frequently introducing the expressions alluded to in the books of Antiquities, to be, that he wrote those books for the use of the Gentiles; while the others were for certain written for the use of those of his own nation that dwelt beyond Euphrates. I might confirm this interpretation from other writers, but I think I have already rendered the matter plain beyond a doubt." Thus far the learned and candid Reland.

The observations of this professor, where he intimates that Josephus never used the expression, "Let every one judge and determine as he pleases," concerning the miracles of the Old Testament, in his seven books of the Wars of the Jews, is certainly true; for having read those books over several times with care and attention, the same observation has occurred to me.

As to any pretence of forgery, which it has been supposed some Catholic Christian might here have been guilty of with regard to the testimony of Josephus concerning Christ, and that as early as the days of Eusebius, if not of Eusebius himself, I must aver it is the effect of the grossest ignorance and partiality.

Albertus Stadenfis, in the thirteenth century, which, though not transcribed, are to be esteemed real confirmations of all the former allegations. This, we have abundantly proved, has been the case of this testimony, in all the past ages of Christianity, and in all the several countries of Europe, during the first fifteen centuries of the church.

There is also another argument in favour of the authenticity of this testimony, belonging to all the past ages, which is usually overlooked by learned Christians, though I think it no inconsiderable one, and that is the contempt all the unbelieving Jews have ever shewn for Josephus, the best historian, beyond dispute, which their nation ever produced after the sacred ones. What can be the reason of this contempt of the genuine Greek Josephus? What the foundation of the fallacious pretence that the Hebrew Josephus was not the genuine Josephus, unless it were the testimonies now under consideration, and especially that concerning Jesus Christ, which bears so hard upon the unbelieving Jewish nation, as could not be endured by them? This must appear to the impartial world the principal cause of their rejecting this excellent author; nor can I devise any other probable cause for this rejection; which, if admitted as the true reason, the authenticity of these testimonies, and especially of that concerning Jesus Christ, will of course also be admitted to be wholly undeniable.

Nor are we entirely destitute of evidence, that, when this testimony had been inserted in a manuscript of Josephus in Hebrew, whether it were in an Hebrew version of his Antiquities, or in a later Hebrew epitome, some Jews caused it to be erased out of it. For see Itigius's Prolegomena, and Dr. Cave's Historia Literaria, Vol. II. under the particular of Josephus. Thus far concerning the first fifteen centuries before printing began.

Since printing began, we find this testimony, I think, in every edition, and in every version of Josephus, in all languages. Nay, since Gifanius and Osiander started that question in the 16th century, and Tanquil Faber first wrote against it in the 17th century, all the remaining manuscripts of Josephus, Eusebius, &c. &c. have been carefully looked into and examined, and every one of them have been found to contain this testimony, and almost every one to contain it in its proper place, under the government of Pilate, and that without any considerable variations. Nor do we discover that any ancient author, from the days of Josephus to those of Gifanius, pretended that he knew of any copies in any language without it, nor give us the least reason to suppose they suspected it, or esteemed it as any otherwise than an authority truly certain and undeniable. To this must be added the high probability there is, from the undisputed testimonies about John the Baptist and James the Just, that Josephus must have given us some such testimony concerning Christ, and the very great probability there is that Josephus's own private opinion was that of the Nazarene, or Ebionite Jewish Christian, with which character it very well agrees in every circumstance. Since, therefore, this is no other than the true state of the case, I think every upright judge, that considers it, must declare, that this testimony is not only evidently and undeniably genuine, but, upon the whole, fully so as any other clauses or sections in the works of Josephus new extant.

It will also here be but reasonable to vindicate Josephus in ■ point wherein some late writers have dealt very hardly with him, I mean when they accuse him as flattering Vespasian with being the true Messiah of the Jews. We shall take the two passages upon which the accusation is built in Josephus's own words. The former is in the 6th book of his History of the Jewish Wars, and runs thus: "If these things are duly considered, it will be found that God exercises ■ providence over mankind, and by many means discovers to them beforehand what is for their preservation, but that they perish by their own folly, and their misfortunes are voluntary. For the Jews made the temple four square, by the demolition of the Tower of

"Antonia, while they had it written in their own oracles, that their city, and the sacred house, should be taken, when the temple should become four square. But what chiefly excited them to the war, was an ambiguous oracle, that a certain person would arise about that time out of their country, who should have dominion over the world. This they took to refer to themselves, and many of their wise men were deceived by that determination; while the oracle designed the dominion of Vespasian, who was proclaimed emperor when he was in Judæa."

The other passage is in Josephus's own speech to Vespasian, in the third book of the same history. "You have now in hand Josephus a prisoner, and your present view perhaps extends no farther; but I come to you as a messenger of greater things. Had it not been for this commission, I could not have been here at present, contrary to the duty of a Jewish general, alive in the hands of an enemy. Wherefore am I to be sent to Nero, when Vespasian himself is so near the empire, that I can hardly distinguish betwixt Vespasian and the emperor, or Cæsar? Besides, his son Titus is to come after him. Keep me close as you please, provided I may be Vespasian's prisoner, who is not only my master, but in effect Lord of the Universe. This is what I have in charge to deliver; and whenever I shall be found to use the Divine authority to countenance a fraud, make an example of me."

Now in all this we have not one word of those predictions relating to the Messiah, which Josephus, in his famous testimony concerning Christ, declares to be very numerous; but of one only concerning the taking of Jerusalem, and the holy house, when the temple should become four square; and one only which foretold, that about that time a very great potentate should arise out of Judæa. This last prediction the other wise men then interpreted as one of Jewish extraction; but Josephus of Vespasian, who was first proclaimed emperor when he was in Judæa, without the least intimation that he thought him to be the Messiah of the Jews. All the Jews, with one consent, ever expected that their Messiah was not only to arise in Judæa, and that of Jewish parents in general, but to be of the seed of David, and of the town of Bethlehem, where David was to be a great prophet like Moses, and to come peculiarly for the salvation, and not the destruction of Israel, with many other characters entirely inconsistent with Vespasian. To what particular oracles or predictions Josephus referred is hard to determine, since he does not name them. I suppose, with Reland, that the first of them might be Dan. ix. 26, 27, as then read and interpreted by the Jews; as also that the second was no other than the famous prophecy of Balaam, that "■ star should arise out of Jacob, and a sceptre out of Israel, &c. Num. xxiv. 17, 18, 19; Josephus ever looking on Balaam as a true prophet.

It will also be necessary here to vindicate the same Josephus from another imputation, which hath been laid upon him, viz. that when, in his second book against Apion, he makes a comparison between Moses, the Jewish legislator, and Minos, with other old heathen legislators, he insinuates, "that though Moses artfully pretended to ■ Divine revelation for the laws he gave the Israelites, as did the others as to their own laws, yet that this was only in the way of ■ pious fraud, and that he did not himself believe that any such Divine revelation was made to him."

This is I suppose ■ new hypothesis, that our Josephus, after all his zeal for Moses, and for the Mosaic laws, should still believe him to be no better than a direct cheat and impostor. And as I suppose this hypothesis to be entirely new, so do I venture to affirm, and that upon no small acquaintance with the writings of Josephus, that the hypothesis is entirely false, and entirely contrary to the whole drift and tenor of Josephus in all his works.

Josephus begins his Antiquities with this most true

true and useful observation, that Moses did not act as did the heathen sages; he did not found a government on human contrivance, to be guided by political maxims, but laid his foundation on the belief of the being, attributes, and providence of the one true God, the Creator and governor of the whole world, and in the fear of that God being deeply impressed on the minds of the Israelites, through a persuasion that he gave them the laws by which they were to be governed, and that in consequence, those, and only those would be miserable who broke them, and were under his displeasure.

Divers Particulars relative to the JEWISH NATION.

WHOEVER has read, or may be disposed to read, the annals of Tacitus, the best writer of his age, must observe the great regard he had to the history of Josephus, while, though he never names him, as he very rarely does any of those Roman authors whence he derives other parts of his history, it yet does appear that he refers to the different books of the Jewish Wars, very frequently in the course of a few pages, and almost always depends on his accounts of the affairs of the Romans and Parthians, as well as of the Jews, during the space of upwards of 200 years, to which those books extend.

Speaking of the origin of the Jews, (liber 5. cap. 2.) he writes, "There are those who report that they were Assyrians, who, wanting land, got together, and obtained part of Egypt, and soon after settled themselves in cities of their own in the lands of the Hebrews, and the parts of Syria that lay nearer to them." This account comes nearest the truth of all his others, and is most probably derived from Josephus, though disguised by himself.

Again, (Cap. 3.)

"Many authors agree, that, when once an infectious distemper was arisen in Egypt, and made mens bodies impure, Bacchoris, their king, went to the oracle of Jupiter, (Ammon,) and begged he would grant him some relief against this evil, and that he was enjoined to purge his nation of them, and to banish this kind of men into other countries, as hateful to the gods."

This story also Tacitus might have got of Josephus, who at large confutes the like story, as published by Lyfimachus and Manethon, in his 1st book against Apion, very particularly observing, that the gods are not angry at bodily imperfections, but at wicked practices.

Again, (Cap. 5.)

"Accordingly they have no images in their cities, much less in their temples: they never

"grant this piece of flattery to kings, or this kind of honour to emperors." These concessions were to be learned from Josephus, and almost only from him. Out of whom, therefore, I conclude, Tacitus took the finest part of his character of the Jews.

Again, (Cap. 6.)

"The limits of Judæa easterly are bounded by Arabia. Egypt lies on the south. On the west are Phœnicia and the great sea. They have a prospect of Syria on their north quarter, or at some distance from them." See the chronography of Josephus, in the 3d book of the Wars, whence most probably Tacitus framed this abridgment. It comes in both authors naturally before Vespasian's first campaign.

Again, (Cap. 7.)

"Not far from this lake are those plains, which are related to have been, of old, fertile, and to have had many cities full of people." This is exactly according to Josephus, and must have been taken from him in the place forecited, and that particularly because it is peculiar to him, so far as I know, in all antiquity. The rest thought the cities were in the very same place where now the lake is, but Josephus and Tacitus say they were in its neighbourhood only.

(Cap. 8.)

"In that city (Jerusalem) there was a temple of immense wealth: in the first parts that were fortified is the city itself, next it the royal palace. The temple is enclosed in its most inward access. A Jew can come no farther than the gates; all but the priesthood are excluded from the threshold." All this is in Josephus. See his three descriptions of the temple of Jerusalem, Antiqu. books 8th and 15th.

(Cap. 10.)

Upon his death, (Cestius Gallus,) whether it came by fate, or that he was weary of life, is uncertain.

tain, &c. Josephus says nothing of the death of Cestius: so Tacitus seems to have known nothing in particular about it.

“When Vespasian was a very young man, it was promised him that he should arrive at the highest pitch of fame. But what first of all seemed to confirm the omen, was his triumphs and consulships, and the glory of his victory over the Jews. When he had once obtained these, he believed it was portended that he should come to the empire.” Josephus takes notice, in general, of these omens of Vespasian’s advancement to the empire, and distinctly adds his own remarkable prediction of it also. Book of the Wars, 3d and 4th.

(Book 5. Chap. 1.)

“At the beginning of the same year Titus Cæsar was pitched upon by his father to finish the conquest of Judæa; and while he and his father were private persons, Titus was celebrated for his martial conduct, and acted now with greater vigour and hopes of reputation; the kind inclinations both of the provinces and the armies striving one with another who should most encourage him.” The character of Titus, in this section, agrees exactly with the history of Josephus upon all occasions; as do a variety of passages in the Roman with the Jewish historian.

Since Suetonius has several passages in common with Josephus and Tacitus, lived at the city of Rome with them, was about twelve or thirteen years younger than Tacitus, and, by consequence, little more than thirty years younger than Josephus, it may be worth our while to examine whether he gives us any indications that he had read the works of Josephus or Tacitus. Now we may take notice that Suetonius never names Tacitus at all; but that he names Josephus once, as having foretold Vespasian’s coming to the empire, and touches both upon the Jews and Christians. He informs us that “The Jews raised a tumult at Rome, under Chrestus, in the days of Claudius, and were thence banished by him.” He says farther, that “Nero inflicted punishments on the Christians, as a superstitious and pernicious sect of men then lately arisen.” He says moreover, that “Josephus, one of the captive nobility amongst the Jews, did affirm most constantly, when he was put into bonds, that he should be loosed by Vespasian, but not till he was emperor.” He also fully attests to the antiquity and uninterrupted duration of that opinion, that “some one who should arise out of Judæa at this time should obtain the empire over the world;” and supposes, with both Josephus and Tacitus, that “such prediction was fulfilled in a Roman emperor,” (Vespasian.) From all these passages it is natural to suppose that Suetonius had seen Tacitus at least, if not Josephus himself, when he wrote his twelve Cæsars. Yet, because he supposes Chrestus to be alive, and at the head of a Jewish tumult at Rome in the days of Claudius, which, one would think, was impossible in any one that had read either Josephus or Tacitus, who both attest that he was put to death in Judæa under Tiberias, and because he says not one word of that remarkable history concerning the statue of Caius, which Petronius was commanded to set up in the temple at Jerusalem, which is so express in Tacitus, and so largely set forth in Josephus, and of which we have another account in the treatise called Philo’s Legation to Caius, I rather think he never read, or, at least, did not think fit to follow, either of these authors.

Nor does the reason appear to me why Suetonius should, in one place, write the name of our Saviour Chrest, with the other ancients in the west, and yet write the name of his followers, with Josephus and Tacitus, with the other Jews, and the heathens in the east, Christians.

As for that judicious historian Dio Cassius, tho’ he lived at Rome, and had many testimonies of Josephus, yet did he not write till the reign of Alexander Severus, and gives so few indications that he had ever read Josephus, that I have no occasion to treat here particularly about him.

With respect to Strabo, that excellent geographer and historian, he lived about half a century earlier than Josephus, and is several times cited by him, and therefore could not himself see the writings of Josephus. It may be worth our notice here, that Strabo’s geography, which has errors concerning Judea, and is still extant, is but once cited by Josephus; but that his histories, which are ten times cited, are lost, and so cannot be compared with the quotations. When Trogus Pompeius, who was epitomized by Justin, lived is not exactly known, but, most probably, a considerable time before Josephus; so that he could not cite him either. However, it appears manifestly, that when Josephus wrote his Antiquities, his own life, and his books against Apion, he understood the geography and history of his own country much better than either Strabo, Tacitus, Suetonius, Dio Cassius, or any other foreign writers whatever.

Some of our later and lesser critics, who have preferred the Greek and Roman prophane historians and writers to the Jewish, and particularly to Josephus, should have learned more candour and modesty from their great father Joseph Scaliger, when, after all his enquiries, he solemnly pronounced that “Josephus was the most diligent and greatest lover of truth of all writers;” and is not afraid to affirm, that “it is more safe to believe him, not only as to the affairs of the Jews, but also as to those that are foreign to them, than all the Greek and Latin writers, and that because his fidelity and compass of learning are every where conspicuous.” To this assertion of Scaliger we are obliged to assent, as the proper result of our observations.

To conclude, let the guilty Jews, since the days of Josephus, and the guilty heretics that followed Simon Magus, bear their own burthen of forgery, corruption, and interpolation, of antient histories and antient records; for they too plainly and undeniably deserve it. But let not Josephus, or the innocent Christians, before antichristianism and popery, bear any such burthen; for so far as we can judge, and we speak it upon full examination, they have the least reason to bear it of any part of mankind whatever, from the beginning of the world to this day.

The Jews had Two Sorts of Years; the Civil, which began in September, and the Sacred, or Ecclesiastic, which began in March.

Before the Captivity of Babylon they accounted the Months successively by 1, 2, 3, &c. but on their return they named them rather after the manner of the Chaldees than Hebrews.

The Hours of the Day.

The Day, reckoning from Sun-rise, and the Night, reckoning from Sun-set, were each divided into 12 equal Parts, called the 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, &c. Hours.

The Morning.

From 6 to 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12.

The Afternoon.

From 12 to 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6.

The Watches.

The 1st Watch was from Sun-set to the 3d Hour of the Night.

The 2d, or Middle Watch, was from the 3d Hour to the 6th.

The 3d Watch, or Cock-crowing, was from the 6th Hour to the 9th.

The 4th, or Morning Watch, was from the 9th Hour to Sun-rise.

INTRODUCTION.

THERE is not a circumstance, amongst the various events of revolving time, more worthy of admiration than the preservation of the people of the Jews, in the midst of all the calamities they have undergone for the space of upwards of 1700 years. It has been remarked with propriety, that religions of every kind depend upon temporal prosperity; that they triumph under the protection of a conquering prince, and languish with decaying monarchies. The Christian church itself, so renowned for its martyrs, has yet been considerably injured by persecutions; and the breaches that have been made by violence could not easily be repaired. However, we have now before us a people, and a religion, which, though persecuted for 1700 years, still subsist, and are very numerous. Kings have frequently applied the severity of edicts and corporal punishments to destroy them. Seditious multitudes have exceeded the rigour and cruelties of princes. Both princes and people, however divided in opinions, either political or religious, have concurred in the design of extirpating this people, but have not been able to effect it.

No. 46.

The Jews have been driven from most parts of the world, which has only served to produce a general dispersion. They have, from age to age, undergone misery and persecution, but still live, notwithstanding the disgrace and hatred that attend them in all places, whilst nothing remains of many of the greatest monarchies but the name.

Their distresses are peculiarly aggravated, from this circumstance, that, though, in former captivities, the Almighty was pleased to point out a time in which he would be reconciled, break the yoke imposed by tyrants, and restore his people to their liberty, no term is now fixed to the duration of their miseries; and we have more certain assurance from the New Testament of their being recalled, than they have in the writings of the prophets, whose race is extinct: nor is one of them to be seen who promises the end of a calamity which has already continued such a number of ages.

The Romans, when they made themselves masters of Judæa, left the inhabitants a public worship, and the exercise of their laws. The synagogues, as those of Damascus, without appeal, determined the affairs of religion even where the Christians were concerned. The high-priest had an eminent power. They had their judges even in Chaldea; but at present they have no shadow of supreme authority remaining; remaining; nevertheless they still subsist as a people, and are numbered by millions.

The chastisements the Almighty has inflicted upon them are most terrible, having involved the people, their religion, and land, in one common destruction. Their religious ceremonies cannot be duly observed. All that pompous train of rites which raised the renown of the Jewish worship, and struck the heathen world with that veneration as to cause them to send presents and victims to Jerusalem, is absolutely lost; for they have neither temples, altars, or sacrifices.

Nor has their religion only suffered, but the professors were massacred; and such as escaped the rage of war, were sold for slaves in the public markets. It seems, indeed, that the land itself was consigned to perdition, as many nations have made themselves masters of Jerusalem one after another. How many revolutions have happened to states in so long a succession of ages? And yet the Jews are the peculiar people to whom God has denied the possession of this little spot of ground, which is infinitely necessary to them, since they should worship upon this mountain, and they never have since met with so favourable a conjunction as could give them the full enjoyment of it. It is alledged that no professor of Judaism can at this day purchase a piece of ground for a grave near Jerusalem.

The modern Jews are dispersed throughout every part of the known world. They abound in the east, and particularly in the great empire of China; and are thought to be the descendants of the ten tribes which were carried away captive. They are spread through most nations of the east, and of Europe and Africa, and many families of them are established in the West-Indies. Their occupation is trade. They are so disseminated, indeed, through all the trading parts of the world, that they are become the instruments by which the most distant nations converse with one another, and by which mankind are knit together in a general correspondence. The Jews are looked upon to be as numerous at present as they were formerly in the land of Canaan. This is wonderful, considering the dreadful slaughter made of them under some of the Roman emperors, which historians describe by the deaths of many hundred thousands in war; and the innumerable massacres and persecutions they have undergone in Turkey, as well as in all Christian nations of the world.

The rabbins, in giving a description of the great havock which has been sometimes made of them, tell us, that there were such torrents of holy blood shed, as to tinge the water in the sea for a considerable distance.

Nor is their firm adherence to their religion less remarkable than their numbers and dispersion. These particulars may be accounted for, from nature and providential reasons. Their numbers may be attributed to their constant employment, their exemption from wars, and, above all, their frequent marriages; for they look upon celibacy as an accursed state, and are generally married before twenty, as hoping the Messiah may descend from them. Their dispersion is naturally accounted for from their having been often driven out of their old habitations in the land of promise, and out of most other places where they have been settled.

Besides, the whole people is now a race of such merchants as are wanderers by profession; and, at the same time, are in most, if not all, places, incapable of enjoying either lands or offices that might engage them to make any part of the world their home.

Their firm adherence to their religion is no less naturally accounted for from its genius and constitution. They are to live all in a body, and generally within the same enclosure; to marry among themselves; and to eat no meats that are not killed and prepared their own way. This excludes them from all table conversation, and the most agreeable intercourses of life, and, of consequence, from the most probable means of their conversion.

If we consider what providential reasons may be assigned for these three particulars, we shall find that their numbers, dispersion, and adherence to their religion, have furnished every age, and every nation of the world, with the strongest arguments for the Christian faith; not only as these very particulars are foretold of them, but as they themselves are the depositories of these and all the other prophecies which tend to their own confusion. Their number furnishes a sufficient cloud of witnesses that attest the truths of the Old Testament. Their dispersion spreads these witnesses through all parts of the world. Their adherence to their religion makes their testimony unquestionable. Had the whole body of the Jews been converted to Christianity, we should certainly have thought all the prophecies of the Old Testament, that relate to the coming and history of Our Blessed Saviour, forged, and have looked upon them no less fallacious than the prophecies of the sibyls.

As to the religion of the modern Jews, it is observable, that all their customs are not of equal authority, nor observed by all after the same manner. The first comprehends the written law, that is, those precepts which are contained in the five books of Moses. The second order relates to the oral law, or that delivered by word of mouth. This contains the comments and expositions of the Rabbins on the Pentateuch, that is, commandments of the doctors: they are collected into a large volume, called the Talmud. The third order comprehends the minhagim, or customs, which use has authorized in different times and places. Of these three orders of precepts the two first only are generally received by all the Jews: the third kind of precepts differs in different countries, according as the Jews have fallen into the manners and customs of the places where they reside.

It is an observation of a French author, that the religion of the Jews, since the preaching of Christianity, is, properly speaking, neither a true or a false religion. It cannot be a false religion, because it has God for its author; neither is it now a true religion, because God himself abolished it by the bringing in of the gospel. Besides, they being without a temple, sacrifices, and other circumstances of religious worship, which they enjoyed in the Holy Land, the religion of the Jews cannot be considered as subsisting any longer.

The Jews came into England in the reign of William the Conqueror, and settled in divers parts; but their principal residence was in London, where they had their grand synagogue. To secure them in their interests and property, the king gave them a civil superintendant, called, at that time, "the Justice of the Jews." His business was to protect them against oppression, to decide all controversies between them and the Christians, to keep the seal of their corporation, and the keys of their public treasury. As to their spiritual government, they were all under one high-priest, who had his patent from the crown. It has been the opinion of some, that the Jews were not then permitted to purchase lands in England; but this is a mistake. However, being generally hated, and not upon an equal foot of privilege with the English, they commonly put out their money to interest, by which means their estates were less subject to discovery, and more at command, in case they should be obliged to quit the country.

During their stay in England, they frequently met with rough usage, with great severity. Sometimes they laboured under the extortion of government, and sometimes the people took their revenge upon them at discretion. However, they had encouragement to turn Christians; for baptism was, as it were, a pardon for all former crimes: and Henry III. built a house for convert Jews, and allowed them a pension for their maintenance. In 1290 the Jews, by proclamation of King Edward I. were banished the kingdom, on pretence that they impoverished the Christians by excessive usury. They departed to the number of 15,000; and it was commonly commonly reported, that, in their passage over the sea, the seamen plundered them, cut the throats of many, and threw them overboard. This banishment was perpetual. However, in process of time, they returned to England, and are tolerated in the exercise of their religion. But we now proceed to our main design.

CHAP. II.

The history of the Jews from the taking of Jerusalem till the rebellion under Adrian.

IT is needless to repeat what has been heretofore related by Josephus concerning the desolate condition to which both the kingdom and metropolis of Judæa were reduced, or the dreadful slavery to which the greatest part of the surviving Jews were condemned by the conqueror. Those that survived this sad catastrophe, and escaped the fury of the Romans, retired some into Galilee, and a much greater number into Egypt and Cyrene, where we shall find them raising new rebellions, committing horrid massacres, and bringing again the victorious Romans against them.

To pretend that the Sanhedrim was removed to Jamnia, and from thence to Tiberias, where it subsisted till after the death of Judas the Saint, that academies were established in many cities, and that the nation continued to be governed by a patriarch, is to run into an allusion founded merely on tradition.

There remained no shadow of power and authority to this wretched people in the country that God had given them. Domitian, covetous even to excess, helped to sink it by his taxes. It has been thought that this oppression respected only the Jews of Rome, who having been expelled out of the imperial city, could not return again without paying a certain tax; but it is a mistake. The tribute demanded by Domitian related to all the Jews, and was not a new one.

Pompey having subjected Judæa to the Romans, made it tributary according to custom. Julius Cæsar granted Hyrcanus, and even the Jewish people, some exemptions. Nevertheless, Josephus adds, that they were obliged to carry their tribute every two years to Sidon. The privilege then consisted in having no intendant or collectors, who, in those times, ruined nations. They were also exempted from winter quarters, and the entertainment of soldiers. They paid nothing in the sabbatic year, because the lands lay fallow. Alexander the Great had granted the same privilege before. Herod being made king, and a friend of the Roman people, it is imagined that he was discharged from tribute; but the Romans (says Tacitus) continued to the princes the title of kings, and at the same time made them sensible of their slavery by forcing them to pay taxes. Cicero would have Jerusalem return thanks to the immortal gods that it had not been razed as Carthage. Apion, speaking of the kings that Mark Anthony had made tributary, names Herod, with those of Pontus and Pisidia; and excepts only from this general law the princes of the Upper Armenia. That which might have misguided the learned is their not seeing any intendants, or receivers, in this province, till after Herod's and Archelaus's deaths. It was, indeed, a shadow of liberty left to this people, to suffer them to collect their taxes by their own receivers, as Josephus has observed; but it cannot be hence concluded that they were not tributary, and that this kingdom was the only exception to the general law. It cannot be doubted but this tribute was regularly paid during our Saviour's life-time, since the Pharisees tempted him by it; and Jesus Christ, discovering Cæsar's image upon the denarion, that was paid for the poll, answered, They should render to Cæsar the things that were Cæsar's.

The truth is, they paid two sorts of taxes: one was a subsidy laid upon the lands, of which they paid the hundredth penny. But, besides this, Apion observes, that there was a capitation, more intolerable to the Jews than all the other tributes; and therefore Judæa petitioned Tiberius to be exempted from the imposts with which it was overlaid, as well as Syria.

This capitation did not seem to be great, since they only paid one denarion; that is, about seven pence halfpenny per head. But it was equal for the poor as well as the rich. As the didrachm was paid equally to God, so the tribute which Cæsar exacted was one and the same to all the inhabitants without any distinction. There were two reasons that aggravated this yoke in Judæa; one, that this people, priding themselves in their alliance with God, and thinking themselves perfectly free, could not brook the empire of the infidels, especially since the Maccabees had shook it off, and the capitation made them feel their slavery. Therefore Judas of Galilee rebelled, when Augustus sent to have Judæa enrolled. There was another reason that rendered this yoke insupportable; for the money that was to be brought to the Roman treasure was stamped with the prince's image; and the Jews, over scrupulously addicted to the law, which only condemns the worship of images, could not see the emperor's figure upon the money, and be obliged to pay, without a mortification.

Hitherto Judæa paid but one tax upon lands, and the capitation, which brought three hundred and seventy thousand eight hundred and thirty-three pounds, six shillings, and eight-pence, into the emperor's exchequer. But after the taking of Jerusalem, Titus ordered the didrachm, which was paid annually to the temple, to be confiscated: and Cicero observes, that they sent it from Rome, and the other cities of Italy, to Jerusalem, because they looked upon it as a tribute which they paid to God as his subjects. But the emperor usurped the place of God, whom they had forsaken, and appropriated this tribute to himself. Each didrachm was worth sixteen pence; and so the sum demanded of them was very considerable. But this third tax was the more disgraceful because they were obliged to purchase the liberty of their religion by it, and Domitian exacted it with the utmost severity.

Xiphilin relates that Titus, after the conquest of Judæa, ordered all the Jews, that would preserve their religion, to pay the didrachm annually to Jupiter Capitolinus. The Romans made them purchase liberty of conscience by it. Tertullian complains bitterly that they had ranked the Christians among prostitutes and vagrants who paid a tribute to be suffered at Rome. The Jewish religion therefore being grown infinitely odious after the rebellion, its professors were obliged to pay an annual sum for their toleration. Suetonius speaks of Domitian's injurious treatment in demanding the payment. They stripped a man to inform themselves of his extract and religion by circumcision. Neither the quality of persons, nor the age, nor the oaths of such as chose rather to pretend to be heathens than to furnish the sums demanded, were respected. A man of ninety years of age was forced to this scandalous inquest, under pretence of which were committed a thousand impieties.

Domitian's hatred stopped not here; for the Jews were comprized in the same persecution with the Christians. We cannot doubt of it, as both of them were, in the opinion of the Romans, equally guilty of impiety, since they worshipped only one God, and rejected idols, which was reckoned an atheism, and adduced as a pretence to persecution. Dion affirms, that many persons, who had embraced the Jewish religion, were condemned for the crime of impiety, and that some were punished with death, and others only with sequestration.

Nerva, Domitian's successor, did three things to the advantage of this nation: he absolved those who were accused of impiety, and recalled the exiles; which shews that if Domitian had that design, he was not able to execute it, being prevented by his assassins.

assassins. He forbid, for the future, the subjects of the empire to be tormented for the sake of religion, impiety, or Judaism. And he discharged the Jews of the imposts wherewith Domitian had oppressed them.

Rise of the patriarchs
of Judaea.

We have placed the first of all the patriarchs of Judaea in this prince's reign, because he was more favourable to the Jews, and because there is no probability that they could so suddenly have re-settled themselves after an almost general dispersion. According to this account, Gamaliel II. was then the head of the fathers, which the Greeks call patriarch. Joshua was elected father of the senate; Eleazar was reconciled with Gamaliel, and they enjoyed their dignity together. Historians say, that Eleazar presided two sabbaths, and Gamaliel one, which shews that this office especially related to religion, and the Divine service.

The Jews endeavour to raise the glory of their desolate nation, by making many learned men survive the ruin of the temple, and live in the beginning of the second century.

Eleazar eminent amongst the surviving
Jews.

Eleazar the Great lived at that time. They make him the son of a person of quality, called Hyrcanus, who had so neglected his education, that at twenty-eight years of age he was ignorant of the law. He bewailed his ignorance for many days; but at last a certain person told him of a master. He made a journey to John, the son of Zechai, who taught at Jerusalem, by whom he was instructed in his prayers, and some points of the law. Eleazar wept and fasted till he had learnt them, and eight days passed over before he eat. His father came to Jerusalem to disinherit him; but was so struck with the learning and modesty he found in him, that he would not sit down before him; and, instead of disinheriting him, he gave him his brothers portions, who had put him upon this design. The Jewish rabbies enumerate these patriarchs, and ascribe to them properties almost divine; but they are too big with absurdity, and it may be added prophanation, to gain credit with a rational or religious reader.

Ezekiel, a Jew.

At that time lived the poet Ezekiel, who composed the departure from Egypt in Greek verse. He was a Jew, and probably meant to sing a miraculous deliverance to comfort his nation, dejected by the Romans, in giving it an idea of a redeemer like Moses. He lived after Josephus, who did not know him; and before Clemens Alexandrinus, who had quoted him. We must therefore place him at the end of the first, or rather at the beginning of the second, century.

The will of the 12 patriarchs composed at that time.

We must also place at the same time the author of the will of the twelve patriarchs. This man has disguised his religion, and speaks so often like a Jew, that a learned man, who was the first publisher of this work in Greek, maintains that the original was in Hebrew, composed by a doctor of that nation some time before the manifestation of our Lord, since the author has followed the common prejudices of the doctors of that time, who expected a general of an army, famous for his battles, rather than a spiritual teacher.

The will of the twelve patriarchs was, however, composed at this time; for the author speaks of the destruction of Jerusalem, and several actions of the Messiah, and even of the writings of the evangelists, like a prophet who had seen these things.

sedition.

The miserable are more mutinous and restless than other people. There is a spirit of sedition imputed to some religions, and to the tempers and inclinations of certain nations. But this is imaginary; for all men naturally love peace and quiet; leave them liberty of conscience, and the free enjoyment, or increase of, their estates, and few rebellions will arise in nations. The hatred of parties, persecution, and the harshness of government, are the common springs of tumults and seditions: men do not swerve from their natural state, except when they are forced by despair or violence. We must not wonder then if the Jews, notwithstanding their miseries, have so frequently an inclination to rebel. Misery puts men into agitation, and makes them turn on all sides to be easy, and commonly, instead of compassing their desires, they add fresh weight to their burthen. The Jews mis-timed their attempts in Trajan's reign. What could make them so venturous as to brave the power of so great a prince? Being provoked by their preceding misfortunes, they carried, in their turn, cruelty and barbarity to a detestable excess; beginning at Cyrene, a city of Lybia, where they had been settled, and potent, for many ages. They had at first some advantages over the Greeks; for so they called the Egyptians; but the fugitives escaping to Alexandria, and carrying consternation, and a thirst of revenge, into this great city, they murdered all the Jews that were there. Those of Cyrene, enraged with a reprisal they had justly deserved, fell into the greatest fury; and being headed by one Andrea, ravaged the plain country under his conduct, and massacred two hundred and twenty thousand inhabitants in Lybia. The Romans returned into the field, under Martius Turbo, their general, whom Trajan had commissioned to quell these disorders. He effected it; but could not defeat the rebels, without long and violent battles, and the loss of many men. Lybia remained so depopulated by the massacre the Jews made in the beginning of the war, that the emperor Adrian was obliged to send a colony to inhabit it.

Eusebius has run into a manifest contradiction as to this rebellion of the Jews; for he affirms, in his history, that it happened in the beginning of the eighteenth year of Trajan's reign; and he places it a year sooner in his chronicle. The history being more exact than the chronicle, we ought to give it the preference, and place this event in the beginning of the second century, and in the hundred and fifteenth year of Jesus Christ. The Jewish historians say, that the war was caused by the ambition of the refugees who had retired to Alexandria after the destruction of Jerusalem, and had built a temple there. Some would fain lord it over the rest, and the weaker party called in Trajan to their assistance, who killed five hundred thousand of them. But their temple at Alexandria was imaginary, that of Onias being the only one they built.

The Thalmudists vary more grossly. Some say it was Adrian that killed twice as many Jews in Egypt as Moses had conducted out of it. Others place this event in Trajan's reign, and others affirm matters with as little foundation.

Nor did the disorder stop there, for news came of new insurrections in Mesopotamia. The fate of Egypt threw the inhabitants of this government into a consternation, who saw themselves menaced with the same misfortune: but Trajan sent a Moor thither, called Lucius Quietus, the greatest general the empire then had, or has had ever since; who, in execution of his commission, withstood the seditions, and, by killing a vast number of Jews, intimidated the rest. Nevertheless, as his presence was thought necessary to retain them in their duty, and there was reason to fear they would take up arms again the very moment the conqueror withdrew, the emperor made him governor of Palestine, to keep a strict eye upon their motions.

A new storm arose in the island of Cyprus. The Jews in this island began with the massacre of two hundred and forty thousand inhabitants. Their own historians do not dissemble this action, but swell the number of the dead instead of abating it; for they tell you, that the noise of the insurrections elsewhere arriving at Gophri, that is to say Cyprus, the Jews, who were very numerous in this country, fell upon all the heathens, and made such a general massacre, that not one of them remained; "Which obliged Trajan to send Adrian, the general of his forces, against them, who subdued them; and afterwards the Romans published an edict, absolutely prohibiting the Jews access to this island."

C H A P. III.

Rebellion of the Jews under Adrian, of Barchochebas and Akiba, till the hundred and thirty-eighth year of the Christian Era.

THESE might be said to be only the beginning of the sorrows of the Jews, which were at length completed by Adrian, who reduced them to such an abject state of wretchedness, that, to obtain the ordinary means of subsistence, they were under a necessity of having recourse to the fraud of magic and interpretation of dreams.

We need no other evidence than that of the emperor Adrian himself, who says, he saw not one Jew in Egypt but what was a mathematician; which name, though, at present, so honourable for useful discoveries by those who apply to this study, was at that time odious, because the mathematicians were generally deemed wizzards.

The cause of this rebellion is differently related. They say that it was the custom, in their country, to plant a cedar at the door of the houses where a son was born, and to set a pine-tree upon the birth of a daughter. These trees grew till the time of marriage, and then they cut them down to make a bed for the married couple. The princess, Adrian's daughter, travelling in Judæa, her chariot broke; and her officers had the insolence to cut down one of these trees planted before a house, wherewith they mended the chariot. But the relations and neighbours, provoked by this action, mutinied, and massacred the princess's retinue, who, being enraged, obliged the emperor to take arms, and subdue so fierce a nation.

Chrysostom asserts, that the Jews, who always, from their prejudices, preserved their own maxims, have three times attempted to rebuild the temple, and that their first effort to restore their republic was under Adrian; that they rebelled against him, without reflecting on the consequences, whom, with all their efforts, it was impossible to conquer: that this prince, having subdued them, placed his statue where Jerusalem was; and knowing that this monument of victory would not last for ever, ordered that the city should bear his name, which was still observed, since, in his time, it was called Ælia. Chrysostom has treated this event with no great degree of precision; for if he believed that the Jews designed to restore their temple under Adrian, he is deceived, since they made no motion towards it; and the first of the attempts ascribed to them is evidently false. The same must be said of the second, if he thought the Jews went to re-establish their republic. It is not even true that they attempted to rebuild Jerusalem. Moreover, Ælia had been built before the rebellion. Nor did Jerusalem still go by the name of Adrian; for it was so called at the council at Nice; but Constantine having built temples in this city, and Christianity being grown triumphant there, it resumed its ancient name of Jerusalem. Eusebius, who had called it Ælia in his history, always styles it Jerusalem in the life of Constantine, when he speaks of the edifices that this prince had raised there.

There were two causes of the great rebellion under Adrian. First, This prince had forbidden them, like Domitian and Nerva, to be circumcised. Spartan says so; and I know not how the express testimony of an author can be contested who lived under Dioclesian. Modestinus observes also, that the Jews, addressing themselves to Antoninus, he permitted them to circumcise only their own children, and forbade doing it to any person of another religion under heavy penalties. Secondly, There is a law forbidding all the Roman citizens to be circumcised like the Jews, or to cause their slaves to be circumcised, upon pain of banishment, and awarding death to the physicians that should do it. It also banishes and condemns, sometimes to death, the Jews that cut the children of another religion. Did the Jews attempt to circumcise strangers, in order to increase their numbers, whereby to go on afterwards more effectually in the restoration of their commonwealth, as St. Chrysostom has said? Some great men have said it after him. But it is not probable they believed that the converted Roman citizens, or their slaves, could make up a considerable army to restore their state. The Roman proselytes were never so numerous to possess them with this conceit. These edicts were given only to prevent any changes of religion, which now and then happened at Rome, and scandalized the heathens. Besides, Antoninus licensed them to circumcise themselves after his war with them. This prince, being weary of their rebellion, and seeing that denying them this custom exasperated them, yielded something to pacify them: but they were not then in a condition to proselyte sufficient numbers to form armies, and restore their commonwealth. Adrian, who had forbidden them circumcision, offended the Jews in one of the principal acts of their religion: it was robbing them of the seal of the covenant, the mark that distinguished them from heathens, and the grace of God, which they thought annexed to this custom: and therefore it is no surprising thing that they should mutiny, when they found themselves deprived of this ceremony.

This prince also had sent a colony to Jerusalem, and built a city upon its ruins, to which he gave his own name, and consecrated it to Jupiter Capitolinus. The second cause of the war is as much disputed as the first, since Eusebius says, that the colony was not sent to Jerusalem till after the taking of Bithur. But Dion says, this colony was the cause of their rebellion, because they could not bear to have strangers come and live in their city, and worship strange gods there; so that we cannot doubt of the truth of the fact. To reconcile Eusebius and Dion, it appears that the emperor's first design was crossed by the Jews rebelling before it was fully executed, because the Jews had expelled the new inhabitants; though the emperor accomplished it when he had subdued them. So that he had sent the colony before the war, as Dion affirms; and he completed his project, when the rebellion was quelled, as Eusebius relates.

A colony sent to Jerusalem before the war

Barchochebas's ambition, who knew how to make his advantage of the disturbance which these two circumstances created in the minds of the people, fully determined the nation to prosecute the war. But to speak of the false Messiahs that have deceived their nation.

The time was come in which impostors appeared with full assurance. Gamaliel had seen two of them perish, and was so moved with the ill success of their enterprize, that he would not have the progress of Christianity opposed, being persuaded that Providence would bring the design to nought if it was not from heaven: "Theudas (said he) before these days rose up, who was slain, and all, as many as obeyed him, were brought to nought. After this man rose up Judas of Galilee, in the days of the taxing, and he also perished: and now I say unto you, if this counsel be of men it will come to nought." The Christians, from an high sense of his great moderation and piety, afterwards canonized him.

Impostors that preceded Barchochebas.

St. Luke, in the 5th chapter of the Acts of the Apostles, particularly speaks of the impostors, Theudas and Judas of Galilee, whom Gamaliel mentions to the people, as having practised their arts heretofore to deceive; from which (though his design was to invalidate the apostle's doctrine) it is evident such delusions had been practised.

Some mentioned by St. Luke, Acts 5th.

The Romans sent some forces against Judas, and he miserably perished, Alexander, Fadus's successor, persecuted his children, and caused them to be murdered. His followers maintained their master's doctrine, with an unshaken confidence, in the midst of the most cruel tortures. They subsisted, notwithstanding the violence that was offered them after the taking of Jerusalem, in a very antient castle, where they were shut up; and the fugitives carried this doctrine into Egypt, where it occasioned new massacres.

Barchochebas the arch impostor.

Other impostors started up, and, with the same fallacious pretensions, endeavoured to delude the credulous multitude; but the most impious, daring, and injurious, was Coziba, or Barchochebas. He was a robber, like the rest, who hoped to enrich himself with plunder, and acquire some authority in his nation by his outrages against the Romans. It is pretended that there were two impostors of this name, the grandfather and grandson; and their history is thus related by the Jews. Coziba I. was elected king by the Jews two years after the ruin of the first temple, and died at Bither, a city in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, which was the capital of his empire. His son the Red succeeded him; and afterwards reigned his grandson Romulus, who was called Coziba. The Jews assembled about him, and acknowledged him for the Messiah. The emperor Adrian, having notice of it, came with a numerous army, took Bither, and destroyed a multitude of Jews, in the seventy third year after the ruin of the temple. Hence it is concluded, that the reign of the three Cozibas lasted one and twenty years. Some extend it much farther, and make the first Coziba's reign under Domitian. The antient chronicle of the Jews, on the contrary, assigns but two years and a half to Coziba's reign.

It is absurdly supposed there have been two Cozibas, or Barchochebas. Most of the Jews acknowledge but one, and they are right. For he that induced the Jews to a rebellion, towards the end of Trajan's reign, was not called Barchochebas, but Andrea. Neither did he call himself the Messiah; and this rebellion was in Egypt, whereas that of Barchochebas happened in Judæa. They were unacquainted with Trajan's genealogy, since they say, that he sent Adrian, his sister's son, against the Jews in Egypt; for Ulpia, Adrian's grandmother, was Trajan's aunt, and these two princes were only cousins. They err in making the war with Coziba last so long, and give him, and his heirs and successors, a reign of one and twenty years; for his race ended with him; and the war terminated in a little time, as we shall see in the sequel. They make him perish in the seventy third year of the ruin of the temple. Adrian was already dead, in the year 141; and the city of Bither, by which the war was concluded, had been taken in the eighteenth of Adrian. This chronological error suffices to shew the misrepresentations of the rest. The author of the chronicle of the Jews is more exact than his commentators, for he makes Coziba to reign but two years and a half, and speaks but of one impostor. We must therefore acknowledge but one Coziba, who took the title of Barchochebas, lived in Adrian's reign, and was the source of infinite mischiefs to this nation.

This impostor, to facilitate the success of his enterprise, changed his name, and took that of the Son of the Star, or Barchochebas, in order to have it believed that he was the Star that "Balaam had seen afar off." He maintained that he was one of the stars of heaven sent to succour the people, and retrieve them from the oppression under which they groaned. He also made choice of a forerunner, of the same character with himself, who was very assistant to him in these designs.

This was Akiba, whom, they say, descended from Sisera, general of the army of Jabin, king of Tyre, and from a Jewish mother. He had spent forty years upon the plains, in looking to the flocks of a rich citizen at Jerusalem, called Calba Chuva. His master's daughter being in love with him, and unwilling to marry a shepherd, advised him to apply himself to study. They made a clandestine marriage; after which Akiba went and spent twelve years in the academy, and brought back with him twelve thousand scholars. His wife advised him to return again. He continued still twelve years more, and brought with him twenty thousand disciples. His wife came to meet him with her clothes rent, because her father, provoked with her marriage, had disinherited her; but no sooner had he seen Akiba than he fell at his feet, revoked his oath, and gave him a great part of his estate. He continued teaching and writing books, one whereof is cabalistical, and is called Jetfirah; but it must be distinguished from that which is ascribed to the Patriarch Abraham, and bears the same name. He was so learned as to give an account of the least letter of the law. We find in the Misnah and Talmud a thousand sentences ascribed to him, and which are looked upon as so many judicious decisions. These are the commendations they give this doctor, who caused the desolation of his country, and supported the fraud of an impostor. No great weight therefore can be laid upon what the Jews relate concerning the birth and death of Akiba, since they are so perfectly ignorant of the time.

Barchochebas appearing at the time that Akiba's fame was at the height, when he was head of the Sanhedrim, he exclaimed, "Behold the Star that was to come out of Jacob," and made himself his forerunner. These two impostors availed themselves of the prejudice of the people, who were for a conquering Messiah, that should deliver them from the Roman yoke, which the last war, and Adrian's persecution, daily made more insupportable. Barchochebas, who found people disposed to follow him, mustered up an army of 200,000 men; and Bither was chosen for his residence, and the capital of his kingdom. The Jews called it Bethtar, or the House of Spies, because, after the ruin of Jerusalem, centinels were placed there to spy those that went to Jerusalem, who were accused of courting the Roman favour, and desiring offices, or of selling their estates, of which they stripped them by virtue of these calumnies. They even sometimes impeached them to the Romans under other pretences. Eusebius places this city in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem; but there were two cities of this name, one twelve, and the other fifty-two, miles distant from the holy city.

Jerome called these two cities Bethoron, and maintains they were built by Solomon, and ruined by the war. Bethoron was given by Pharaoh for a portion to his daughter, when she married Solomon, who restored it to the Levites, in whose partition it lay. But if we believe the Jews, this is not the true Bither, since one signifies a House of Spies, and the other a House of Liberty. Barchochebas chose this place to receive the royal unction, and afterwards caused money to be coined, declaring himself at the same time the Messiah, and Jewish prince of the nation. He waited to declare war when the emperor Adrian had left Egypt; but it burst out in the year 134, in the seventeenth of Adrian's reign.

Dion asserts, that Adrian, having sent a colony to Jerusalem, and placed a statue of Jupiter where the temple of God stood, this foreign worship violently affected the Jews. "However, Adrian's presence, who was then in Egypt, and who went from thence to Syria, stopped them for some time. They contented themselves, during his time, with making imperfect arms, and selling them to the Romans, that they might not employ them against themselves; but they revolted when the emperor was gone."

Phlegon, Adrian's secretary, has preserved a letter of his master, addressed to Servian, the consul. He gives him an account of what he had seen in Egypt, and of the turbulent inclination of its inhabitants; and makes him a present of some vessels, which he had designed for him and his sister. It is easier to know the time of the Jewish war from this letter, than from the medals of the cities of Syria; for it must have been written when the emperor left Egypt or Syria. Servian, to whom this letter was written, was his brother-in-law, since he made him a present in common with his sister and himself. This Servian is called consul, which dignity he had not under Adrian till 134. We must conclude then that the emperor left not Egypt and Syria till the beginning of that year, and that his absence the same year instigated the Jews to rebellion. Another heathen historian historian, quoted by Eusebius, asserts, that the war was in its whole vigour; and that Bithur, which the rebels had fortified, was taken the tenth of August, in the eighteenth year of Adrian. The war therefore began the preceding year, since it was in its vigour, and near its conclusion. The emperor gave his name to the city he had built about the ruins of Jerusalem in the year 136, in which he celebrated his Vicennialia. So that the war began in the year 134, and ended two years after. Buonarroti produces a medal struck by this prince in the eighteenth year of his reign, for having obtained a great victory over the rebels, and driven the Jews from Jerusalem. To this nothing can be objected, but the authority of the Jews quoted by Jerome, who say the war lasted three years and an half.

The Romans at first seem to have neglected this revolt: as the Jews had been so effectually humbled by Trajan's wars, they could hardly imagine they would so soon be in a condition to oppose them. But when they saw the numbers of the seditious increase, and that they fought with a valour that seemed raised upon despair, that all the robbers of the neighbouring provinces joined them in hopes of plunder, and that not only Judaea, but all the world was in motion, they were obliged to change their measures. Some think that the emperor marched in person against the rebels; because they observe, that this prince, writing to the senate, had not ventured to preface his letters with the ordinary form, because of the great losses he had sustained in this war; but, on due enquiry, it appears that he carried it on by his generals.

Barchochebas, who was superior in troops, at first committed great ravages. Justin Martyr complained that he openly attacked and massacred the Christians, because they would not abjure their religion. His hatred against these professors of religion, and despair of making the Christians embark in his violent measures, who had the same interest as himself to declare against the Romans, might redouble his cruelty. But can it be imagined that the heathens, against whom he declared war, and the colony which Adrian had begun to send to Jerusalem, were more humanely treated by this usurper than the Christians? This impostor only favoured his own nation, and treated with the utmost barbarity all others that fell into his hands.

We find, by Eusebius and Syncellus, that the general, who commanded the army in Judaea against Barchochebas, was called Tinnius Rufus. Adrian, who was not acquainted with the importance of the war, sent him at first a great reinforcement; but this commander being often defeated, he sent for Julius Severus, one of the greatest generals of his age, from Britain. This able commander deeming it imprudent to engage to powerful an army, attacked them in parties, straitened them in their camp, cut off their provisions, and by that means growing superior, laid siege to Bithur, which they made their retreat.

The rabbins say, that there were in that city four hundred colleges, in each college four hundred professors, and that each professor of these colleges had four hundred scholars, who being mustered up made a great army. They sustained the first efforts of the siege, though they were very badly armed, and unacquainted with discipline. Barchochebas encouraged all his subjects, and executed Tryphon, a famous rabbin, who talked of surrendering. Nevertheless the city was taken, and Barchochebas was killed. Adrian, to whom they brought his head, was desirous to see his body; but when they attempted to carry it, they found a serpent about his neck, which frightened the bearers; and the prince acknowledged that God alone could kill that man. However, they have since owned the imposture of this man, whom they afterwards called Barchozab, or, The Son of a Lie. The scholars, who had so well defended the place, were bound with their books, and thrown into the fire. They add, that the slaughter was so great, that more people died in this war than came out of Egypt. Upon one single stone were found the skulls of 300 children. The inhabitants of these places did not dung their ground for seven years together, being sufficiently fattened by the carcasses: therefore they have inserted in their liturgy a hymn appointed for the fast celebrated the eighteenth of the month of Ab, which answers to the months of July and August, in which they call Adrian a second Nebuchadnezzar, and pray God to remember this cruel prince, who destroyed 480 synagogues. As for Akiba, after a very severe imprisonment, he was condemned to a cruel death; and with him, the Jews tell us, died the glory of the Jewish laws.

Indeed, Dion represents this war as one of the cruellest that ever was. The Romans were frequently beaten, and lost abundance of good troops. The Jews, who had, at that time, a profound veneration for Solomon's tomb, saw it fall; and at once the wild beasts entered Jerusalem, which was an omen of the following slaughter. The presage was not insignificant, for five hundred and eighty thousand persons were killed in the battles; and the numbers that perished by famine, misery, or fire, cannot be reckoned. After the taking of Bithur, the Jews had still fifty fortified castles, and troops to defend them. It seems also, from a medal that the emperor struck the year following, that he had obtained a victory over them that year; but, in reality, the resistance was not long; and the leaders being taken off, the rest more easily submitted.

Adrian finished the building of Ælia, (Jerusalem;) but the Jews of St. Jerome's time ridiculously ascribe this work to Ælius Titus, their destroyer. Epiphanius says, that he gave Aquila, his brother-in-law, the care of these buildings. But this proselyte, who turned Jew after he had embraced Christianity, had no consanguinity with this prince; nor do we find that he was entrusted with the inspection of these buildings. The circumference of the new city was somewhat different from the old, several places being included in it that were formerly without the gates; but, in the main, they made use of the foundations of the first city. Valesius denies it, and, for a reason, alledges, that Adrian would be far from re-building a city implacable to the Romans, and favouring the Jews, who had brought upon him such a wretched war. But this prince did not do it in favour to the Jews, for he gave it to other inhabitants. And therefore historians observe, that they began to settle a bishop there, who came of heathen race. The design was to mortify the old inhabitants, by excluding them for ever from their primitive habitation.

The truth is, Adrian prohibited their return for ever: and to make the city odious, if it were possible, he changed the use of the remaining monuments of old Jerusalem; for he employed the stones that had been used in the building of the temple to make a theatre; and he erected statues of false gods in the places where the temple formerly stood. And, lastly, St. Jerome says, that he caused the image of a hog to be placed over the gate that led to Bethlehem, to shew that the Jews were subject to the power of the Romans: but he is mistaken; the swine was not placed there to indicate the Jews' slavery, but to make them abhor entering into Jerusalem, because they hated this animal, the use of which was forbidden by the law, and they thought the gate was defiled and profaned by this figure.

Adrian, the more effectually to evacuate the city of its old inhabitants, caused a great part of them to be sold at the fair of Terebinth. Hegeippus says, that the Terebinth was a tree that had continued from the creation of the world, under which they met to traffick: but it was the place where Abraham had pitched his tent, and received the angels, which made it venerable. The Jews were exposed to sale there at the price of horses; and those that could not be sold, were carried to another fair, which was kept at Gaza. In Jerome's time they applied to this misery these words; "A cry was heard in

This war is attended with horrid massacres.

Jerusalem rendered odious to the Jews.

Number of Jews sold at the public market.

in Ramah, Rachael weeping for her children ;” because their misery and affliction were excessive. This Father also applied to the miseries that happened under Adrian this prophecy of Zachariah, “I will feed the flock of slaughter ;” because that he had learnt, from the tradition and ancient history of the Jews, that this prince had put a great number to death, punished others with the most rigorous severity, and sold them at Terebinth, or carried them into Egypt. This Father acquaints us with three things. 1. That he had read the traditions and history of the Jews concerning their calamities, and therefore there must have been such at that time. 2. That Terebinth fair still continued ; but that the Jews were ashamed to be present at it, because they remembered the usage of their fathers. 3. That the Jews assembled, and came, in his time, to buy, of the soldiers, the liberty of seeing Jerusalem. They could not weep without paying for it. The old men and women were seen, with tears in their eyes, to repair to the mount of Olives, and bewail the destruction of the temple. The soldiers made great advantage of the Jews’ veneration for the remains of the holy city, and of Adrian’s severity of forbidding their entrance for ever ; for they sold them, at a dear rate, the sight of this place, and the liberty of throwing perfumes upon a stone there. Jerome assures us, that Adrian conveyed part of these prisoners to Egypt, where their number was considerably augmented.

Adrian, having successfully concluded the war in Judæa, stamped medals, on which was seen a woman holding two naked children, and sacrificing upon an altar, with these words :

ADVENTUS AUG. JUDÆÆ.

The arrival of the Emperor in Judæa.

Tristan thought that the woman, who sacrifices, represents this subdued province, which consents to become heathen, and to sacrifice to the false gods ; and that she brings to the altar two naked children, to shew that she renounced circumcision. The emperor meant rather to signify, by the altar and sacrifice, that the old religion was abolished in this province, which he had colonised with new inhabitants. We see another medal of this same prince, where JUDÆA is represented as a woman on her knees, giving her hand to the emperor, and three children imploring mercy. One of these children is naked. Will it be said that the design of it was to shew his not being circumcised ? The medalist’s intention was to impress a monument, representing the submission and desperate misery of Judæa, after Barchochebas’s defeat.

Those that dwelt in the east were much more fortunate. Trajan had carried the war against them as far as Mesopotamia. But Adrian, upon his accession to the throne, having preferred an inglorious peace to a doubtful war, consented that the Euphrates should be made the boundary of the Roman empire. So that the Jews of this country had no share in this prince’s war against their nation.

It is true a confederacy had been formed of three sorts of Jews. Some inhabitants of the neighbouring provinces, animated with the hopes of plunder, and the first advantageous successes, joined their ancient enemies to fight the Romans. Many Jews of other provinces of the empire, who still breathed after their liberty, and sought an opportunity of recovering it, laid hold on this. Perhaps too some came from the remotest parts, and from beyond Euphrates, to the succour of their brethren ; and therefore the number of the dead amounted to above six hundred thousand ; which number could not have been found in Judæa alone, after what it had suffered under Trajan. Nevertheless, it cannot be said that Adrian himself carried the war into the east, and passed the Euphrates ; for he went into his retreat of Tivoli, where he rendered himself completely odious by the exercise of his various cruelties.

We find that this prince added a new degree of misery to the Jews, by imposing on them a tribute for the liberty of reading the Bible in Hebrew, and that this tribute was still paid in Tertullian’s time ; for he says, in his apology, that the Jews, every sabbath, purchased the liberty of reading publicly by a tax they paid. They say that the Jews that had highly esteemed the Septuagint version, began to abhor it, when they perceived it was more favourable to the Christians than the Hebrews. But Adrian commanded them only to use this version ; so that they were forced to pay money to read the Hebrew in the synagogues on the sabbath.

CHAP IV.

Of the disciples of Akiba, and of the other learned men who lived at that time.

WE are told that Akiba left many disciples, who all distinguished themselves by their learning. But the most celebrated amongst them was Judah Hakkadash, who compiled the Mishnah, or Commentary on Leviticus. He was the son of Simeon the Just, born at Sepphoris, and flourished during the reigns of three emperors, who were great enemies to the Christians, but very favourable to the Jews, viz. Antoninus Pius, M. Aurelius, and Commodus. He became very considerable on account of his sanctity, and much more for his great learning, and presided over the grand academy of Tiberias with uncontrouled authority. But he was esteemed above all for his famous book called the Mishnah, or repetition of the law, of which the following is an abstract.

The Mishnah is divided into six parts. The first is intitled “Seder Zerahim,” and treats on seeds in the fields, trees, fruits, plants, &c.

The second, “Seder Mohadim,” treats of the Jewish feasts.

The third, “Seder Nashim,” treats of women, and all matrimonial causes.

The fourth, “Seder Nezikim,” treats of losses, damages, trade, the law-suits arising from them, and the manner of proceeding in them.

The fifth, “Seder Kodoshim,” treats of sacrifices, oblations, and all other holy or sacrificed things.

The sixth treats of all kinds of expiations, and all things relating to purification. Each of these books contained several tracts, amounting in the whole to sixty-three.

This code, or body, of oral traditions, is founded upon a five-fold authority.

1st. Upon the writings of Moses, whose explications are contained in the Pentateuch, and are either decisive of themselves, or by consequences fairly drawn from them.

2d. Upon the ordinances of that legislator delivered to him on the mount, or, as they are commonly stiled, the oral law, which are looked upon to be of the same authority with the written.

3d. Upon the different decisions of the ancient doctors, concerning which a man is at liberty to take which side he pleases, whether, for instance, those of Hillel or Shammai.

4th. On the maxims and sayings of the prophets and wise men, which are on that account stiled the hedges or fences of the law ; but from which the rabbins do often swerve ; though, in the main, they hold them in great esteem.

5th. On the ancient rites and customs, which have since since gained the sanction of a law, and are made by it equally obligatory.

This is the sum of that so much boasted treatise, which is therefore stiled a body of civil and ecclesiastical rights of the Jews, and is a collection of their oral laws, rules, &c. However, it is probable this book was not published, or, at least, received, immediately, since we find mention made, in Hege-sippus, of such oral traditions being still appealed to, and canvassed, towards the latter end of the second century. Those who want a fuller account of it, may consult the Latin version of Surenhusius, with the notes of several learned commentators.

Jochanan Hassandalar, who lived also in Adrian's reign, said, "that every assembly that was made in the name of God remained, and that others were dispersed;" because virtue is the soul of societies, and the knot that ties them close, but vice ruins and destroys them. We should not speak of Eleazar, the son of Simeon Jochaides, who was pursued by the Romans, and concealed a long time, with his father, were not some prayers ascribed to him, which the Italian and German Jews make use of.

One of the most famous of all Akiba's pupils was the illustrious Meir. They gave him this name because he was the light of the learned, and opened the eyes of his disciples. He married a learned woman, whose decisions the Thalmudists receive with greater reverence than those of her husband, notwithstanding all their veneration for him.

Dositheus was one of Meir's disciples; but we must not confound him with one Dositheus a priest, sent by Esarhaddon to the Cuthæans, to teach them the law, that they might not be devoured by lions. There was also another Dositheus, who was the son of Janni, who could not have studied under Meir, since his father lived not till the end of the second century. This man determined that it was no crime to forget some portion of the law, except when it was done voluntarily; and this forgetfulness became innocent, when application to study was the cause of it. The decision is not very curious; but yet it has admitted Dositheus into the rank of Tanaites and Fathers, whose sentences are religiously preserved.

Somechus, the son of Joses, was another of Meir's scholars, and a most excellent casuist.

Chelpeta, a citizen of Tispori, had two sons that studied under Meir. Joses grew the most famous. The emperor Adrian banished him from Tiberias, and sent him to live in his native country, where the learned were not honoured as in an academy. Here he took to the trade of a currier. The Jews, who find most part of the doctors to be only mechanics, have turned their reproach into glory, by making a law, commanding all Rabbins to learn a trade. Some Christians imagine this was done in emulation of the apostles and disciples, who laboured with their own hands; but this reasoning is unjust; for if the handicraft of the apostles was a subject of jealousy, the Council of Trent ought not to have destroyed this glory, and changed it into a reproach, by forbidding the conferring of orders on a man that had not a benefice or a patrimony sufficient to maintain him. Besides, it was better to get a livelihood by honest labour, like St. Paul, than to authorize such a mendicant indolence as that of the Monks.

His younger brother, Scimon, who lived under Antoninus, and the following emperors, with Judah the Saint, was a man eminent for his skill in the learned and more abstruse sciences.

The same age produced another Scimon, the son of Eleazar, a man of learning, but of excessive pride, which, however, according to the account of a Latin writer, was humbled by an extraordinary incident, so that afterwards he acquired the graces of modesty and candour.

Meir had also the honour of instructing Judah, the author of the Misnah, of whom we have spoken more at large; and presume these sketches will suffice to shew the genius of the doctors of that age.

Antoninus Pius becomes a proselyte to the Jewish religion. Is offended with the Jews, and makes war against them. Defeats them, and grants them privileges under certain restrictions. Justin Martyr has a conference with Tryphon. Principles of the latter. Marcus Aurelius makes war against the Jews, and punishes them for entering into a confederacy with Cassius. Conversion of Hege-sippus. His account of the different sects of Jews. Other sects mentioned by Justin Martyr. Various translations of the Scriptures.

ANTONINUS Pius, who was adopted by Adrian, and raised to the highest dignities, is represented as a great friend and patron of the Jewish nation, having been a disciple of Judah, and submitted to the rite of circumcision. He always, however, dissembled his religion; and though he professed Judaism, which he was perfectly acquainted with, yet he appeared devoted to the service of idols. He constantly favoured the Jews; and so strenuously applied himself to the study of the law and tradition, that he joined with his master Judah in the composition of the Misnah.

Antoninus, however, instead of countenancing the Jews, was soon under a necessity of making war against them, because they had rebelled. Adrian's prohibition of circumcision was still in force. They had obeyed an emperor who forced them to it by the torrent of his conquests, and power of his arms. But they could not long brook their being deprived of this accustomed sign of their religion. They rose the first opportunity, and were resolved, sword in hand, to oblige Antoninus to give them this liberty. Capitolinus, in his narrative of this war, has comprized Antoninus's victories in the compass of five or six lines, and by his brevity occasioned Baronius to believe that the insurrection of the Jews happened in the first year of his reign. But the Jews, who were dispersed, and extremely debilitated by Adrian, required some years to collect a body, and capacitate themselves to make head against a potent prince. Besides, Capitolinus's account is a compendium of this prince's noble actions, which ought to be distinguished, as having been achieved at different times. The Jews were unsuccessful, and defeated by Antoninus; but when he had conquered them, he restored them the privilege of circumcision under these restrictions.

1. It only related to the Jews: but the Samaritans, who professed the same religion, had not the benefit of it. 2. Proselytes were also excluded, and none of them were suffered to be made Jews by this rite.

Justin Martyr had at that time a conference with Tryphon. The Jews speak of a famous Rabbin, who was preceptor or colleague with Akiba, called Tryphon; and Dr. Lightfoot thinks it was he that Justin Martyr disputed with. He was not only rich but charitable; for we are told that Akiba, being employed to take care of the poor, he gave him 4000 gold crowns, which he distributed in one day. Though he was a disciple of Schammy's school, yet he has been esteemed; and many sentences of his are preserved and inserted in the maxims of the Fathers. He solicits men to hasten their sanctification, because of the brevity of human life. God demands it, and the recompence will be considerable. Nevertheless, he teaches, "That man is not obliged to the performance of the whole law; and provided he does his endeavour to know but one part of it, yet he shall receive a great reward."

We are taught also from him, that the name of twelve letters ceased to be pronounced at that time. The name of Jehovah is ineffable, because it expresses the essence of God without ambiguity; whereas whereas the others only make him known by his attributes. There was moreover a dispute among the doctors about the manner of pronouncing it. The prophane, who increased their numbers after the death of Simeon the Just, abused it; and therefore they left off pronouncing it. Instead of this ineffable name was substituted one of twelve letters, which the priest uttered in giving the blessing to the people. But Tarphon affirms, that one day coming near the priest to hear him pronounce his benediction, he perceived that he did not articulate the twelve letters; but that he only muttered whilst the brethren sang; and the reason of this change proceeded from the number of the prophane, which was increased. They highly commend the wisdom of this Tarphon, and his knowledge in the law.

Marcus Aurelius's war with the Jews.

Though Marcus Aurelius was naturally of a mild temper, yet this exempted not the Jews from great miseries during his reign. This prince had such an opinion of them, that, as he once passed through Judæa in his way to Egypt, he cried out, that he had found people as wicked as the Marcians and Sarmatians; those barbarous nations that made continual war, and ravaged a great part of his empire in his reign.

Besides, there were two circumstances very prejudicial to them. Vologesus, king of Parthia, was making warlike preparations at the time that Antonius died; and he commenced the war a little after his death by violent incursions. Severian, the governor of Cappadocia, attempting to oppose him, perished with his whole army. Marching afterwards into Syria, the Parthians made terrible destruction. The eastern Jews, who were subject to the Parthians, and enemies to the Romans, joined them, and increased the number of their troops. Marcus Aurelius sent Lucius Verus, his colleague, with the best officers of the empire; but he stopped at Antioch to relax, and left the war to the management of his generals. Cassius, who commanded, beat Vologesus, and pursued him to his capital Ctesiphon, which he took, and demolished the palace of the kings. Babylon, which still made some figure, Mesopotamia, and the lands of the Medes, where there were a great number of Jews, were laid waste. Seleucia, upon the banks of the Tigris, voluntarily surrendered: but the Romans violating the capitulation, killed four or five hundred thousand persons. By a treaty of peace concluded four years after the beginning of the war, Mesopotamia and Osrene, however, remained subject to the Romans. Thus the Jews of this country were reduced once more under their obedience.

Their confederacy with Cassius punished.

Cassius, who left the east to vanquish the Sarmatians, flushed with so many exploits and victories, which raised him to the rank of heroes, encouraged, as is said, by Faustina, Marcus Aurelius's wife, who was for making him an emperor, that he might marry her after her husband's death, assumed the title of emperor in Syria, where he was governor, having first spread a report that the throne was vacant by Marcus Aurelius's death. His reign was but a dream, for it lasted but three months and six days. However, the Jews, who only waited for an opportunity to rise, seeing the fire kindled in the neighbourhood, added fuel to the flames, by joining with the rebels. Marcus Aurelius pardoned the children of Cassius, whose head had been brought to him, and spared the blood of the senators who had engaged in the conspiracy. He even caused his letters to be burnt, that they might not be known. But he could not bear the insult which the Jews had offered him, and to punish them he renewed Adrian's laws against them. Whether these laws were ill executed, particularly in Asia, where the Jews were numerous, and very remote from the capital, or that they purchased the liberty of annoying the Christians, they signalized themselves in this country by their hatred. Justin Martyr had before charged them with the consequences of this passion, which frequently broke out. But they manifested it at Smyrna, in Polycarp's martyrdom; for they not only joined their voices with the heathens, in crying in the theatre, "He is an Atheist," but were also the most vehement round his pile. They persecuted this great man after his death, by soliciting the judge to deny his body to the Christians; but, at last, the captain of the guards, seeing the bitter rage of the Jews against the dead body, caused it to be reduced to ashes.

These commotions might be made by a mutinous rabble, and tolerated by reason of the hatred to the Christians; yet it is certain that the Jews enjoyed great liberty of conscience at Smyrna, since they were present at the theatre, and distinguished themselves from the heathens. Moreover we find some footsteps of their authority in Phrygia, by the answers that an orthodox person made to the Montanists, who accused them of being murderers of the prophets. "Is there one of them that, from the origin of their sect, has been persecuted by the Jews, or killed by the impious? Is there any woman who has been whipped in the synagogues or stoned?" This author attributes to the Jews the persecution of the Christians, and the branches that divided Christianity. He adds the power of scourging. The uncontroled and numerous rabble in Asia, in Marcus Aurelius's time, pursued the Christians in the streets with stones, and sometimes crucified them. It is even very probable that Thraseas, bishop of Eumenia, or of Emalhisar, in Phrygia Pectiana, was martyred in this manner. The circumcised must have been numerous in this part of the world, since Montanus endeavoured to allure them, by giving the name of Jerusalem to two little cities of Phrygia, which he looked upon as the principal seats of his sect.

This time produced the conversion and unusual baptism of a Jew. A man of this nation travelling, in the reign of Marcus Aurelius, with Christians in a desert, was taken with such a violent thirst, that it was thought he was going to expire. He demanded baptism with an impatience, which made the Christians uneasy, as being utterly destitute of water. One of them supplied the defect, by taking sand, which he threw upon the catechumen's body, pronouncing the baptism form. The Jew recovered by this new baptism, and marched on to the city of Alexandria. Dionysius, who was then bishop there, being informed of the fact, ordered the Jew to be re-baptized with water. Nicephorus adds, that such another instance happened under Athanasius; and he has annexed a third example, that fell out in his time at Constantinople.

The conversion of Hegesippus, who lived at that time, seems also dubious to many. It is agreed that he was a Jew, and that he embraced Christianity; but some sectarists represent him as a kind of half Christian, in not being brought to give up certain tenets he had imbibed from his infancy.

Though the truth would not be weakened by the loss of its defenders, and by the judgment we form at this day of his doctrine, yet we cannot forbear saying, that the arguments produced against him are very weak. For Eusebius only says, that he had published several things drawn from the Hebrew and Syriac gospel, and the unwritten traditions of the Jews. It should therefore be concluded, that he continued a Jew, because he used the unwritten traditions of the synagogue; as it is concluded he was an Ebionite, because he has sometimes quoted the Hebrew gospel. Nevertheless, nobody denies that he embraced Christianity. Hegesippus says, that he went to Corinth, where the church continued constant in the purity of the faith; and that Primus, who was then bishop of it, gave him great comfort by the discourses they had concerning the truth. From thence he went to Rome, and maintained constant communion with the bishop who held the see. The church of Corinth was neither Arian nor Ebionite. Hegesippus attributes to it the profession of a true faith. He united with this bishop, and conversed with him about this pure faith: it is therefore indisputable that Hegesippus was of the same religion with the bishop and and the church, whose purity of faith he commends, and that he held the doctrine received at Corinth and Rome.

Hegefippus informs us, that there were traditions among the Jews, and that they were not written in his time. We have reason therefore to think, that Judah the Saint, did not compose the Mishnah till Commodus's reign, towards the end of the second century, since they were not yet published in Hegefippus's time, who lived under Marcus Antoninus. Eusebius had first placed him under Adrian; but it seems that he discovered his error, and corrected it.

Hegefippus speaks of four famous sects among the Jews; the Samaritans, the Pharisees, the Sadducees, and the Essenes; to which he adds the Galileans. These were the followers of that famous Judas, who rose in the days of the taxing made by Augustus, and who would not have the emperors acknowledged for their lords, nor tribute paid to them. This spirit of sedition was still in being; and these sectaries were those who had caused the terrible rebellions which completed the ruin of the nation. The Hemero-baptists are charged by Epiphanius with having incorporated all the errors of the Pharisees and Sadducees; but I do not see what reason there is for this accusation; for their name only denotes their care to wash themselves every day, or many times in a day. It was a branch of the Pharisees that Christ taxed with fondness for washings, and who afterwards separated from the body of the sect to make a particular one, and perhaps a more rigid one in point of washings.

Hegefippus reckons the Masbothæans amongst the Jewish sects. This sect arose after our Saviour; for they are not known from the gospel, nor by any more ancient author. We discover their true opinion in the apostolical constitutions: they denied a Providence, and believed that every thing happened by chance: they also rejected the doctrine of the immortality of the soul. So that the Masbothæans were a branch of the Sadducees; as the Hemero-baptists proceeded from the Pharisees. I know not wherefore it has been thought that their name was borrowed from the sabbath, which they observed more religiously than others; for there is no analogy betwixt the terms Masbothæans and Sabbatarians. It was the character of the heretics of that time to confound languages, and to coin unknown words from them. There were other Masbothæans, disciples to Simon Magus, which Theodorot has distinguished from the Jewish sectaries, and with reason, for they derived that pedigree from one Masbothæus, their founder, and may be ranked among Christian heretics.

Justin Martyr gave Tryphon a very different account of the sects that divided the Jews of his age, though he was cotemporary with Hegefippus. He passes over the Essenes in silence, as if they were vanished; and I could easily believe that Hegefippus only mentioned them because they had formerly made a considerable schism in the nation. Justin Martyr maintains three sects, the Genists, the Merists, and the Hellenists. It is said the Genists derived their glory from being the descendants of Abraham, the Father of the faithful. The Merists divided the Scripture, and did not receive all the prophets, because they were animated by different spirits. These Merists might be those mentioned by Benjamin of Tudela. He found a schism at Cairo, because the Jews of Babylon, and of the Irack, divided the Scripture differently from those of Syria. The former so partitioned it, as to read it all in one year; the others multiplying the sections, read it but in three years. Scaliger imagined that the schism was between the Greeks and Babylonians, because he had read in Benjamin the word Igrikim, which he translated the Greeks. But Constantine the emperor, who published and translated his travels, read it iræakin. The Jews of the Irack were perhaps Hegefippus's Merists; who began to separate about the manner of reading and dividing the Scripture.

The Hellenists began also to set up a new sect, of which it will not be amiss to trace the original. After the conquests of Alexander the Great, a distinction was made of the Hellenist Jews, which is expressed in great characters in the gospel. This name was given them because they were mingled with the Greeks, spoke their language, and read the Holy Scriptures in it after they were translated. We observe this only difference between them and the other Jews, with whom otherwise they partook in the same religion, sacrifices, and ceremonies.

Scaliger imagined that the jealousy and hatred were of very long standing betwixt these two parts of the nation, and that they had always made a kind of schism. They reproached the Hellenists with reading the Scripture in the Egyptian way, from the left to the right, and this was a kind of an affront. From reproaches they came to blows; and whilst the second temple stood, Eleazar, the son of Tsadoc, entering the synagogue of the Alexandrians at Jerusalem, laid the most provoking things his rage could suggest. Scaliger found traces of this schism as low as the twelfth century.

If Scaliger was right, the sect of the Hellenists would be much more ancient than we make it. But though there was some jealousy betwixt the Hellenists and the Jews of Palestine, yet it proceeded not to separation or schism. The Hellenists were even permitted to build many synagogues at Jerusalem for their use, where they performed their devotions; whilst Josephus has related no dispute upon this matter, nor Philo complained that his countrymen were ill used.

The learned are divided, and run into extremes, as to the rise, cause, and time of the division. Some, as Salmasius, think they have proved, that the Bible was never read in Greek, because it was not read in Arabic, which was more common, and better known by the Jews than the Greek could be. Another joins together both Hellenists and Jews into one synagogue at Jerusalem; and fancies that he finds a proof of it in the history of the Acts, where the Jews and Greeks were divided about the creation of the deaconesses; which could not have happened had they not been both in the same synagogue, as if the question there was not about the converted Greeks and Jews, who made but one body in the church, where they could not continue long without dividing.

Others, prepossessed in favour of the Septuagint version, find it every where, and exalt it far above the original. The safest way is to embrace a due medium. Necessity required that the Hellenists, who understood not Hebrew, should read the law in Greek in their synagogues. Though it were true that Philo, and some other of the learned, understood the Syriac, there would be still the same necessity of the Greek version for that great number of Hellenists that were in Egypt, and in all the great cities of Asia under the Roman jurisdiction. The Jews of Jerusalem could not condemn this practice, since they had such another in using the Chaldee paraphrases; and when there were no written paraphrases, they filled up this defect by an explication of each verse, which custom being as ancient as Ezra, authorized that of the Greek versions in all the places where the Chaldee was not the language of the country. Simeon, the son of Gamaliel, who lived at the time of Titus's war, determined that the law might be read and written in Greek. We shall see hereafter why the Gemara has limited this decision to the five books of Moses. We may add that R. Levi, coming to Cesarea, where there were many Greeks, was surprized to hear the Hebrew words "Hear O Israel" pronounced in Greek. But R. Josès asked him whether those that understood not Hebrew never read the law; and added, without waiting for an answer, answer, "That whoever reads in ■ language he knows or understands, does his duty."

Lightfoot, who could not deny but that there were Greek copies in the synagogues, imagined that they were placed there by way of precaution, that when the heathens came in to explode their religion, they might be convinced by their own eyes that it was not bad.

To own that there were Greek copies in the synagogues, is to confess that the law was read in this language; and the Hebrews hindered not a custom that was universally received in the regions of the Roman empire. Nevertheless, they both of them considered the original as sacred, and preferable, as well to the versions as to Chaldee paraphrases, because it was God that had made choice of this tongue.

Christianity disturbed this harmony of the Jews. The Christians disputing with them, always used the version of the LXX. which not only was better known, but more advantageous to them. Justin Martyr produces proofs out of it; for he taxes the Hebrews with having lately struck out these words of Jeremy, "I am like a lamb that is led to the slaughter," which were found in the seventieth version. He carried his proofs farther, in quoting a passage of Esdras, which is no where to be found, and which he is accused of having put into Greek; though it is more than probable that this fraud was more ancient than he that made use of it. These reproaches, well or illgrounded, began to disgust the Jews with the Greek version, and to give them less esteem for those who were obliged to use it. The originals were cried up above the version, which was rejected, and found pernicious: they flew into an extreme, and this dispute produced four effects. 1. The name of Hellenists became odious; and those that bore it, finding themselves abused with bitter reproaches, set up the sect mentioned by Justin Martyr. Here then you have the origin of the sect. 2. They attempted new versions, of which we shall give an account. 3. The Gemarists, not being able to prohibit the reading of the Greek books, confined it to the Pentateuch; because these five books contained less disputed prophecies than those of the other prophets. 4. As the hatred to the Hellenists continually increased, those fabulous prodigies were invented, said to be wrought at the time that the Septuagint version was composed, and they talked of a fast that was celebrated on the account of this version, of which no mention is made in the Talmud. Thus it is we disentangle the history of the Hellenists, and not only extricate it with probability, but our opinions are founded upon many irrefragable testimonies. These new sectaries appeared therefore a little before Justin Martyr; or rather the name of Hellenists, which was hardly odious before, grew so then, and became the title of ■ sect.

The different parties fell to work upon several translations of the Scripture, and this sort of business became much in fashion among the Jews; which the Hellenists we have been speaking of desired; or else they became more necessary to dispute against the Christians dispersed over all the Roman empire. Aquila was the first that engaged in it; whose version was received with a general applause of the Hellenists. Origen affirms, That all the Jews, who did not understand the Hebrew, were accustomed to this version, which they looked upon to be the best of all. Philestius not only says the same thing, but adds, that some heretics followed it. In the mean time the Thalmudists, full of that jealousy that had for some time prevailed against the Hellenists, made their efforts to disgust the people with it, and reduce them to the Hebrew Bible. We find, in their writings, several strokes of censure against the Greek one. The Christians complained of it, because it came from a suspected hand, and which had robbed them of many passages of Scripture; but, however, they sometimes made use of it: and St. Jerome, who had condemned it, praised afterwards the exactness of the author.

Theodotion made another of them. The Jews carried off this conquest from the church for Theodotion, who was born an heathen, had embraced Christianity; but being brought over to Judaism, was circumcised. He was ■ native of Pontus, where he had known Marcion, his countryman, and had entered into his sect. From thence he went to Ephesus, where the Jews were numerous and considerable, and he lifted into the synagogue. It seems that this was an invasion upon Antoninus's law, who forbade the Jews the making of proselytes, and circumcising them. But we have already observed, that these laws were ill executed in Asia; and perhaps Marcus Aurelius had revoked them; for Theodotion made no mystery of his circumcision, and the Christians knew it well enough. He learnt of his new masters Hebrew enough to translate the Scripture, or rather to copy the Septuagint; for he followed them so close, that Origen made use of his version to fill up the chasms and vacuities that were found in the Septuagint. It is said that he published it in the first year of Commodus's reign, according to the custom of that time; for the learned took a pride to publish their works in the Decennalia or Vicennalia, and at the birth of princes, or when they came to the throne. Not to dispute about this custom, did a Jew make ■ sufficient figure in the empire to honour Commodus's coronation by a version of the Holy Scriptures? As odious as his person must have been, the Christians reaped some advantage by his work; and read publicly his translation of the prophet Daniel, because that of the Septuagint was full of faults; or rather because this version was by an hand that was much inferior to those that had worked upon the Pentateuch. Also the Ebionites and Nazarenes preferred it before all others. Symmachus composed ■ third translation in Severus's reign. It appeared much clearer, and more useful than the preceding ones; because this author had more respect to the sense than to the signification of words. The Christians made use of all these translations; though they were only made to their prejudice, and by doctors that infinitely hated them. However, the version of the Septuagint still raised its head above all these new fangled pieces. In the mean time it must be owned that they were only undertaken to weaken its authority, to hinder its being used in the synagogues, as it hitherto had been, and to prevent the Christians, who disputed with the Jews, from drawing objections out of it. For, indeed, these last interpreters had robbed us of Isaiah's oracle, "A virgin shall bring forth."

PESCENNIUS Niger being proclaimed emperor in Syria, endeavoured to make Judæa, which was adjacent, declare for him; and finding this people of an unshaken fidelity for Severus, he did them all the mischief that the shortness of his reign could permit him. Severus was not so sensible at first as he ought to have been of their firm attachment to him. Besides, he was taken up with more important affairs; being obliged to carry the war into the east against Vologesus, king of Parthia. The Jews, who were numerous betwixt the Tigris and the Euphrates, suffered much from this war. Adiabena, whose kings had professed Judaism at the end of the last century, and the beginning of this, was ravaged. Babylon and Seleucia were taken. The siege of Ctesiphon lasted long, because the Romans were reduced to the feeding on herbs and roots: but this city city being carried by storm, part of its inhabitants were put to the sword, and 100,000 persons carried prisoners out of it.

We are told that Severus, being apprehensive that the Jews, dispersed in the east, would declare for Vologesus, softened them by many edicts. But it does not appear that they were distinguished from the rest of the subjects of the Parthian empire, and the favourable edicts were not promulgated till after the war.

On the contrary, Severus, at his return, marched into Judæa; and Eusebius says positively, that he made war with the Samaritans and Jews. Besides, the senate, confounding what the father had done in Syria, and the son in Judæa, decreed a Jewish triumph. The emperor, in the same journey, made several laws relating to Palestine, one of which prohibited the turning Jew. He left this nation liberty to circumcise their children; but hindered the receiving proselytes, and initiating strangers by this custom. They had an abode, and some settlements, in Galilee; but the inhibition of living at Jerusalem was still in force in Severus's reign. It cannot then be doubted but Severus declared against this nation in the first year of his reign.

But at length he grew more favourable to them, when he was apprized of their fidelity; or, which was; perhaps, a more prevailing motive, as he was beyond measure covetous, when he came to know that they had many rich and considerable persons, who would be glad to purchase his protection on any terms. Accordingly we find several of them raised to high posts, and preferred to the Christians, who were persecuted with grievous imposts.

There was another law made in the same prince's reign, importing, that "the privileges of the Jews extending only to things that might prejudice their religion, they should be called to the Tutelage of the heathens like the rest." Guardianship was burthensome in all ages. Nevertheless, strangers were excluded from it at Rome; and a man could not exercise it without being a denizen of this great city. Nevertheless, this prince persecuted the Christians, instead of promoting them to dignities.

These laws therefore shew that the Jews were looked upon as Roman citizens, since they were charged with the guardianship not only of children of their own nation, but with that of idolatrous strangers, and that they were capable of offices; and divers employments; and this irrevocable edict was observed for a great many years; but at last Leo abolished it. There was a clause in the law of Severus which rendered it doubly advantageous; for, by giving the Jews the enjoyment of all the privileges of Roman citizens, they were left the liberty of refusing offices of court, and being made decurions; because if there was any degree of honour in these posts, yet they were too burthensome. They were shunned instead of being canvassed for; and those that were called to them were forced to an acceptance. The emperors shewed favour to such as they exempted from them; and the eunuchs of Constantius made a trade of these immunities, which they sold. His successor Julian has been highly commended for cancelling all these exemptions, and for being so rigorous in that respect, that he scarcely granted it to those who endeavoured to discharge themselves on the most plausible pretences. Severus therefore shewed great favour to the Jews in allowing them these exemptions, and this puffed them up with pride and insolence, especially against the persecuted Christians.

St. Jerome says, that, in the twelfth year of Severus, a jubilee was celebrated. This term is peculiar to the Jews; but Scaliger has remarked, that whatsoever way we reckon the years, the Jewish jubilee could not happen in this. The Christians had borrowed this word from the synagogue. But yet it was not a jubilee of the church; and those that should refer the origin of that celebrated at Rome to this, would be grossly mistaken; but Severus causing the secular games to be celebrated in the empire, the Christians, who partook in the feast, called it a jubilee.

Caracalla followed his father's steps; nor can it be doubted but that he loved the Jews from his childhood, since one of them at court, who was his play-fellow, being whipped by the emperor's order, he was so afflicted, that he would not see his father for several days. So that, as we do not find he acted against the Jews, we have reason to believe that they took the advantage of a quiet interval to make their collection of traditions.

There were two sorts of traditions; some that were peculiar to the Hellenists, and others received by the Hebrews of the Holy Land, descended from the Pharisees. The former traditions, vented by the fore-cited authors, were actually unknown, and rejected by the Tiberian doctors, whose contempt and hatred of the Greeks increased daily.

Traditions, both Jewish and Hellenist, were by this time grown very numerous, and the teachers and writers of both not a few. In this century flourished the famed Jochanan, chief of the Amaraïen, or commentators on the Misnah, and compiler of the Jerusalem Talmud. The most probable supposition is, that he was born about the latter end of the second century, or Anno Dom. 184 or 185. Some writers pretend that he was chosen chief of the academy of Tiberias in the fifteenth year of his age, which is improbable, and contrary to the practice of the Jews, because his master was still alive; and Caniner, whom he appointed his successor, is affirmed, by the Jewish chronologists, to have enjoyed the dignity about ten years more; so that the soonest he can be supposed to have ascended the chair is about anno 225, and about the fortieth year of his age, by which time he had an opportunity sufficient to finish his studies under those two masters, in order to qualify himself for his great work, in which he was assisted by two other learned rabbies, R. Samuel, and Rab, or Rau, who had likewise been disciples of his two masters, Judah the Saint, and R. Chanina.

The following is a brief account of this famous production, commonly known by the name of the Hierosolymitan Talmud.

The word Talmud signifies "Doctrine," and is emphatically given to this work as being a compleat system or body of it, or of the religion and morals of the Jews. They have two of that name and import, viz. this of Jerusalem, which is the shorter, and more obscure, of the two; as likewise the more ancient by near one century; and that of Babylon, of which we shall speak in its proper place. It is properly a comment upon the Misnah of Judah Hakkadash.

Judah had scarcely finished his own work, before he had the mortification to see a collection of different traditions published, and afterwards inserted in the Misnah. To remedy, therefore, this evil, these three great men wrote this comment upon it, which being compleated in Judæa, and in the Hebrew then in use, was stiled the Gemarrah, or Perfection; and this and the Misnah together made that which is called the Talmud of Jerusalem.

This Talmud, distinguished by the title of "Hierosolymitan," being still found not only too succinct, as well as too obscure, by reason of the barbarous terms it had borrowed from other nations, gave birth to the Babylonian Talmud, compiled by Rabbi Ase, a learned disciple of the great Jochanan, who left the academy of Tiberias, and went to preside at that of Sara, near Babylon, where he continued in that dignity about forty years, during which he compiled his Gemarrah, or comment upon the Misnah of Judah the Saint; and from the place where he wrote it, it came to be stiled the Babylonian Talmud. Ase did not live to finish it; but this was effected by his sons, and some of his disciples; so that it became a vast body or collection of traditions concerning the canon laws of the Jews, and of all the questions relating to the Jewish law, wherein the Mishnah is the text, and the Gemarrah the comment upon it.

The Jews in general prefer this Babylonian Talmud, on account of its clearness and fullness, above that of Jerusalem; and though it abounds with ridiculous fables and stories, they will not suffer any one to call it in question without the censure of heresy. We shall dispense with giving a farther account of that voluminous work, and only observe, that the learned Maimonides hath given us an excellent abridgement of it, in which he has thrown out all that was puerile and ridiculous, and confined himself to a collection of the most material cases and decisions that are contained in it. This epitome, which he styles "Yad Khazchah," or, "Strong Hand," is therefore much preferable to the Talmud itself, as being one of the most complete bodies of the Jewish laws that ever was written.

The Jews are in danger under Heliogabalus.

Hitherto the Jews had lived in peace and happiness, but had nearly suffered a most dreadful persecution in the reign of Heliogabalus. That whimsical prince caused himself to be circumcised, and abstained from swine's flesh out of devotion to his gods. He might have borrowed this from the Jews, in whose neighbourhood he had been brought up, and with whom his family had intimate correspondence. But all this predilection would not have secured them from his violence, had not death prevented it.

Lampridius relates, that this prince, having built a fine temple to the honour of Heliogabalus, ordered the Palladium, the vestal fire, the mother of the gods, and whatsoever was held most sacred by the Romans, to be conveyed thither, being resolved that Heliogabalus should be the only person to be worshipped. To render this union of worship more compleat, he formed the design of introducing the Samaritans and Jews religion, who were well known to him. The lives and fortunes of the Jews depended upon the execution of this design; for they would never have consented to have worshipped the sun in the emperor's temple, with that heap of ceremonies his religion consisted of; and they could expect nothing but death, and the most cruel tortures, from a prince whom the historians compare to the Neros, and other monsters that have governed the empire. The unexpected death of this prince, who was assassinated by his soldiers, secured them from this impending danger. Indeed, he only says, it was a design of the emperor's, and that he talked of doing it. Beside, though Heliogabalus had sent the image of his god, and had ordered it to be placed in the senate above victory, even before his entrance into Rome, and though the historians relate the extravagancies he committed to honour this deity, yet it required time to build the temple in which all religions were to be combined. Eusebius says, it was not raised till the year of his death; and so God thereby preserved them, as well as the Christians, from a scourge that was likely to destroy them.

Clemency of Alexander Severus.

The clemency of Alexander Severus contributed doubtless to the flourishing state of the Jews; for, indeed, this prince openly favoured that nation. The wits of that time called him an Archi-synagogue of Syria; because he favoured the Jews, corresponded with them, and was instructed in their religion, of which he had received some tincture from his mother Mammæa. Indeed, this prince had a variety of religions in his head. He never abandoned the gods of his fathers, nor the heathen idolatry, which still prevailed. But he lifted among these gods Abraham, the Father of the faithful, and the great patriarch of the Jews. It seems as if he only did it to rectify the design Heliogabalus had formed of ranking the Samaritan, Jew, and Christian, with the heathens in the same temple; but he did it with candour and charity.

Alexander Severus was for having the names of the officers he sent into the provinces proclaimed, and the people licensed to accuse them; because, as the Jews and Christians proclaimed their priests, that they might be known, it was fit the same thing should be done in point of governors, who were entrusted with the lives and fortunes of the people. In fine, he often repeated this maxim, which he had learnt from the Jew and Christian, "Do not to others what ye would not have them do unto you."

The following emperors continued the tranquillity which this nation enjoyed. Philip, who was born in Arabia, where the Jews had so great a commerce, gave them countenance. Decius, who persecuted the Christian church in hatred to the protection Philip had granted it, might have confounded them with it. But, besides that the difference of these two religions was well known, it does not appear that they had any share in the short and violent persecutions this prince brought upon the church. Nor must they be admitted into Valerian's persecution, nor considered as the authors of it: though Dionysius of Alexandria says, this prince was compelled to it by an Archi-synagogue of Egypt.

We may observe, that they place the doctor Scesiath at the end of the third century. He was blind, but nevertheless became very learned. He had also a dispute with the Christians. Two works are ascribed to him; one upon the Cabala, which was an explication of the Splendors, the manuscript of which was in the Heidelberg library: the other was a Targum, or a Chaldee paraphrase upon the Scripture.

CHAP. VII.

State of the Jews in the east. They are greatly favoured by the Romans. Learned men among them in that part of the world. The Jews persecuted by Sapor. The Persians make war against the Romans. The Jews are greatly favoured by Zenobia. Sapor is vanquished by Odenatus. Zenobia is defeated by Aurelius, and afterwards lives in retirement.

IT is now time to pass over the Euphrates, and give some account of the eastern Jews, of their princes and chiefs, of their captivity, their academies, and most celebrated doctors, and such other transactions as may be deemed worthy of notice. These chiefs and doctors did not begin before the third century to make a figure, and to found their most celebrated academies. We therefore think that this new dignity was not introduced into Babylon till the time of Huna, the son of Nathan, who was contemporary with Judah the Saint, and flourished about the year 220, or, at the earliest, under his father, about the beginning of the third century. Even then their authority could be but small, considering the slavery under which the Jews groaned from the Parthians, Romans, and other tyrants, whatever titles they might bestow on them to raise the credit of their nation.

Artaxerxes, the famed restorer of the Persian monarchy, died about anno 244, and was succeeded by his son Sapor, from whom the princes of that new succession took their name. Both of them became great favourers of the Jews, and shewed an extraordinary esteem for the rabbies. They had been hitherto much despised, but under his and the following reigns, they had so great an authority, that the state was governed by their advice. Indeed, this was the time that their academies at Babylon were erected and grew famous, of which, and the doctors that then flourished, the following is an account.

Samuel, the astronomer, had left Judæa to go into the east. He settled at Nahardea, which he rendered very famous by his astronomical lectures. He found out the method of fixing the four revolutions of the year, or the solstices. He was counsellor to Huna, prince of the captivity. He is said to die in the year 250 of the Christian æra. His glory was eclipsed by that of Ada, who was born at Babylon, and had a more exact knowledge of the courts course of the sun than his predecessor. There were, indeed, at that time very considerable men of their nation at Babylon, as well as learned men in their academies.

The honour of this academy was supported by two great men, who lived in the same century; one of whom was Jehudah, the son of Eliezar. He raised himself by his learning much above the professor of Sora, who could not stand against him, but by his alliance with the princes of the captivity. We find in the Babylonian Talmud abundance of his decisions. His hatred of the heathens, whom he compares to asses, manifestly appears there. But this aversion to strangers has generally raised the glory of doctors instead of depressing it. Nachman also possessed this chair, and kept up the succession of eminent doctors. This was the state of one of their eastern academies in the third century. Let us pass to that of Sora, which is no less noted.

Abba Aricha, who is entitled Rau, by way of excellence, and known only by that name, had gone into Judæa, to study under Judah the Saint, with Samuel, the astronomer. But, after his master's death, he returned to Babylon to teach there. He refused to settle at Nahardea, to avoid competition; but erected his academy at Sora, where he remained till his death. One of the princes of Babylon, called Adarchan, was so fond of him, that he went to hear his lectures, and was circumcised. They make him the author of a commentary upon Ruth, and some other books. But as the number of authors was very great at that time, their works are hard to be distinguished. Rau determined that the synagogues ought to be raised above all the houses of a city. The city where it is not so shall perish, said he; for God hath extended mercy unto us to let up his house. He never went to sea with an infidel, lest God should exercise his judgment at that time. He imagined the Romans were to become masters of all the world.

Huna, a relation to the prince of the captivity, and of the same name, succeeded him in this academy, and pluming himself upon this alliance, or being full of vanity, was the first that took the title of prince of the academy. He had an hundred and sixty volumes of the law; but one was found illegitimate, because it was as long as broad. This may suffice to give us an idea of the character of these princes of the academy, and what taste they had for learning.

Let us add another learned man, called Cohana. He had left his country, like the rest, to go and study in Judæa, which was the route then in fashion. A man was not thought to be learned unless he had seen the academy of Tiberias. Having heard Jochanan, and seen the patriarch Samuel, he returned to Babylon, where he officiated as a priest.

All the learned, that sought a retreat in the Persian empire, and erected academies there, demonstrate that Artaxerxes treated them with great clemency.

But these Magi did not enjoy that uninterrupted felicity under the reign of Sapor, as they had done under his father and predecessor. It appears that he corresponded with the rabbins, and disputed with them. As it was not the custom of the Persians to bury their dead, he wondered that the Jews should do it. He sent for Chasda, one of the learned of that time, who was afterwards president of the academy of Sora, and had under him twelve thousand scholars. He asked the reason of this custom, and required him to prove it by an express passage of the law. The doctor was reduced to silence: but another, that was more subtle, evaded the objection; and, instead of a precept, produced examples. Sapor likewise quoted the example of Moses, who was not buried. The doctors still evaded the difficulty, by saying, that the people wept for him.

This prince from controversy came to persecution; as appears from a Jewish historian, who had read, in the annals of Persia, which had been sent to the king of Spain, that the people of his nation had till then been very happy under the dominion of the Persians, because their rabbins had learning and integrity equal to that of the doctors who lived before the fall of the temple. But the people, elated by the esteem they were held in, obliged the king to persecute them. He resisted their importunity some time; but fearing the people would mutiny, and the rather because the Arabians threatened him with a war, he imprisoned, against his will, three of the principal Jews of his dominions, and endeavoured to force them, by scourging, to renounce their religion; but they bore it with constancy. Being mortified with this unsuccessful attempt, he made all the princes of the Jews prisoners, and tortured them to the utmost extreme. But God avenged their cause; for the Persians were no longer so happy as they were before. The Arabians made war against them, and bound all the Persian kings with fetters. The king of the Arabians sent officers, with promises to the Jews, that, if they would retire to his territories, they should enjoy full liberty of conscience, because a religion embraced by constraint becomes useless. The Persians perceiving that the violence they had exercised drew these chastisements upon them, permitted the Jews the profession of their religion.

The Persians had again taken up arms against the Romans, and besieged Antioch, which was forced to surrender. Capitolinus, who is quoted as an evidence, says, that the Persians held it, when Gordian came to the assistance of the subjects of the empire. This prince obtained many advantages by means of Mithreus, his father-in-law, and prefect of the Prætorium, who took Corra, Nisibis, and drove Sapor to his capital. Gordian marched to the extremities of Persia, where he was killed by Philip. The soldiers, in honour to their commander's memory, set up a tomb with this inscription: "To Gordian, conqueror of the Persians, of the Goths, and Sarmatians; to him that appeased the seditions of the Romans, who conquered the Germans, and could not conquer the Philippi." The Latin word is equivocal, and may signify that he could not conquer, or keep the field of battle at Philippi, because he had been beaten there by the Alanes, or else he had been conquered by the Philips, who had caused him to be killed. This inscription was engraven in Persian and Jewish characters, that every one might read it; and is a farther confirmation that there were, at that time, abundance of Jews in the Persian dominions, and that they spoke Hebrew, because these characters were used to communicate to them the encomiums bestowed on Gordian.

The splendor of the Jews revived through the means of Zenobia, who might be stiled the queen of the east. This princess, who became so famous, had married Odenatus, king of Palmyra, and commander of the Saracens of that country, which was but a day's march from the Euphrates. Odenatus, seeing every thing stoop before Sapor, sent him presents, and wrote to him in testimony of his submission. The conqueror, who had penetrated already into Cappadocia, and taken Cæsarea, tore Odenatus's letter, and ordered his presents to be thrown into the river. Being exasperated of himself, and by Zenobia, a most haughty princess, he made an alliance with the Romans, declared war with Sapor, gave him many battles, which he always won, and obliged this victor of so many provinces to give up all the treasures he had amassed in Syria, in the garrison of Edeffa, to purchase his retreat. Odenatus pursued him, ravaged Mesopotamia, routed the nobility of the kingdom several times, who were assembled upon business of state, and twice besieged his enemy in Ctesiphon. But, after divers conquests, and being declared Augustus, Zenobia, his wife, who would reign alone, caused him to be slain, with a son he had by a former wife.

Zenobia had been brought up in the Jewish religion, and was a zealous professor of it. She is recorded to have built a great number of stately synagogues, and to have raised the Jews to the highest dignities. It cannot be doubted but the Jews

Jews made great use of her protection, and became very potent in the east under Odenatus, her husband, who carried every thing before him. When she came to the throne, she added Egypt to her conquests; extended her arms into Asia Minor, as far as Tyana and Ancyra; and passed into Bithynia, where she took Chalcedon.

by Aure-
lian.

At this juncture, however, Aurelian began to restore the affairs of the empire, which Zenobia had ruined. He entered into Bithynia, which acknowledged its former master without resistance. From thence he went on to Cappadocia, and the gates of Tyana being shut against him, he vowed vengeance on all the inhabitants. Zenobia was at Antioch, from whence she advanced with her troops as far as Immes, which was not far from it. The battle was fought near the river Orontes. Aurelian's troops retreated, that they might put the queen's horsemen, who were heavily armed, out of breath; and falling afterwards upon them, they put them to flight. Zabdas, who commanded for the princess, foreseeing that Antioch would shut her gates against him, if they had notice there of his defeat, dressed up a man, and calling him Aurelian, gave out that he carried the emperor prisoner. The stratagem was quickly discovered. He staid no longer at Antioch than to take Zenobia along with him, and make a precipitate retreat.

A second battle was fought, in which Aurelian's cavalry was broken; but whilst the Palmyrenians pursued it, they fell upon the infantry, which was cut in pieces. Zenobia had no other resource than to shut herself up in Palmyra, whose situation was advantageous. The Persians, Saracens, and eastern nations, still devoted to this princess, notwithstanding her misfortunes, in vain attempted to succour her. The Persians were beaten, and the Saracens obliged to lift in Aurelian's army. Zenobia secretly departed out of the city to seek for succour among the Persians. But, as she was going to pass the Euphrates, Aurelian's couriers, who pursued her, took her prisoner. Palmyra surrendered. Zenobia was led in triumph with her son. She was adorned with jewels, and mounted upon a stately chariot, on which she had hoped to make a triumphant entry into Rome, whereas she entered like a slave. The chariot of her husband Odenatus was also one of the ornaments of Aurelian's triumph, who exposed to view whatever was most rich and precious in the east, which, by his present victories, he had re-united to the empire. Zenobia went to Rome, or rather to Tivoli, where she had a small villa, and lived in retirement.

Her reverse
of fortune.

Thus vanished this glimpse of prosperity and authority of the Jewish nation, unless it may be said that Vaballat, her son, to whom Aurelian gave some sovereignty in Armenia, had embraced his mother's religion, and favoured the Jews as she had done, which is very uncertain.

Doctors that flourished in the east.

Most of the Jews retired into the cities of Persia, where their doctors continued in some repute. They boasted highly at that time of one Chiia, the son of Ase, who not being able to conquer the force of concupiscence, threw himself into a smoking bake-house.

There was at that time a famous disputant, who not only puzzled the Babylonian doctors, but, to shame them the more, made his wife dispute with them. He was called Jeremy, and was master of casuistry. Other doctors had flocked to Sora, because the academy of Nahardea was fallen with the city, which was taken and plundered. Zira, surnamed Kattina, was still there. He at first left his country to go and study at Tiberias, where he had also received the imposition of hands; but the authority and friendship of Huna had recalled him to his academy, where he lived till the year 300, when desiring to lay his bones in Judæa, he chose rather to carry his living body thither himself, than have it conveyed after his death. So that though the Jews of Babylon had a great esteem for their own country, yet that hindered not their going to study in Judæa, whence they commonly returned before they died.

But the most famed among them was Manes. He could by no means be reconciled to the religion of the Jews, nor to what was recorded of their nation destroying and exterminating such numbers of people and kingdoms. He preferred the doctrine of the Christians, which recommended nothing so much as love and benignity. Nevertheless, he held great conference with the Jews of Persia, where he had much correspondence, whether he designed to be fully instructed in the law, or rather desired to recover them from what he called their infatuation. The modern Jews are not agreed about their ancestors conference with Manes, and in their kalendar they fix the origin of his sect towards the end of Constantine's reign.

The persecution which was raised against the Christians under Dioclesian did not much effect the Jewish nation, either in the east or west; though those of the former pretend that he designed to have made them feel the severest marks of his resentment, for some scandalous reflections which the disciples of Judah the Saint had cast upon him; but that they found means to appease his wrath.

C H A P. VIII.

State of the Jews under the Christian emperors during the fourth century. Prevalence of the human passions. The Jews said to be severely persecuted by Constantine, who is vindicated from such aspersions. Conversion of Joseph. The emperor Constantine issues an edict for suppressing the outrages of the Jews. Enacts several laws relative to the Jews. Decrees of the council of Elvira. Account of Ravenna, or famous rabbi of the east. Also of Joseph the Blind. The Jews raise a persecution against the Christians in Persia. Commit great outrages at Alexandria. A rebellion against Constans. Edicts of Constans against the Jews. Conversion of Epiphanius. The emperor Julian grants protection to the Jews. A city in the East inhabited by the ten tribes. Conduct of Jovia, the successor of Julian. The Jews greatly favoured by Maximus. Vindication of St. Ambrose. St. Jerome esteems the Jews. Takes great pains to learn Hebrew. His different masters. Eulogium bestowed on him for his learning.

THE Jews were not much happier under the Christian emperors than they had been under the reign of idolators. Their fate varied according to the genius of princes. The Christians were so galled by the persecutions they had suffered, that they could not so suddenly resolve upon a change of maxims. Constantine contented himself with making some laws that confined the Jews' liberty to narrower bounds, though they were the objects of his hatred; but, by degrees, way was given to the bent of nature, which tends to the punishing and persecuting those that contradict us in point of religion. The councils themselves, that ought to have been more equitable, were of this temper, and became incendiaries, that inflamed princes against the remains of a miserable nation. We often boast of humanity, and fancy the instincts of nature sufficient to make us compassionate to other men; but we do not well consider this matter. Pride is another principle in man, who has far the ascendant over humanity, and rises upon seeing those considerable parts of mankind, who think differently from us, and assume the privilege of contesting the truths we believe ourselves possessed of. Humanity suggests notions of lenity; but pride quickly imposes its silence, inflames the heart, and deafens the mind to the dictates of justice and equity. And as all men are obnoxious to this passion, it is no wonder to find persecutions in all religions. Those that more immediately appertain to sacred offices, are more cruel than than the rest, because they not only are puffed up by opinion, which raises them above the level of men of equal birth, but fancy the opposition made against the mysteries of which they are the defenders and ministers, to be a personal affront upon themselves: so that councils commonly authorize and begin persecutions, which kings afterwards carry to the utmost excess.

The first event we find in the life of Constantine concerning the Jews is related by Zonaras. This historian says, they had a conference at Rome with Helena, this emperor's mother, who was yet unconverted. They represented to this princess, that, though her son had reason to abolish heathenism and its idols, yet he had made no great progress towards his own salvation, since, instead of the heroes of ancient heathenism, he worshipped a man who had been crucified but a few ages before. Helena, who was devout, and anxious for her son's salvation, called the doctors to a conference with pope Sylvester, who quickly triumphed over the enemies of the Christian religion.

It is said, likewise, that Constantine persecuted the circumcised; for St. Chrysostom affirms, that, upon their assembling once to re-build Jerusalem, this prince, disgusted with the rash attempt, surprizing them, caused their ears to be cut off, and afterwards dispersed them into all the territories of his empire, as so many fugitive slaves. Eutychius adds, that Constantine obliged them all to be baptized, and to eat swine's flesh on a passover day. Persecution cannot be carried farther: but I question the truth of these particulars. Though Chrysostom has great authority in the church, he is liable to error: for the Jews say themselves, that it was the emperor Adrian who caused their ears to be cut off, like the slaves which he sold at the fairs of the emperor. Besides, Jerusalem had been re-built under Constantine's empire; its bishop had assisted at the council of Nice; and the emperor had raised such stately edifices in it, that Eusebius told him it was the New Jerusalem. We may add, that though the Theodosian code contains many laws against the Jews, under Constantine's name, yet there is not one condemning them "to the loss of their ears, to be baptized, or to eat swine's flesh."

But this prince published several edicts, which acquaint us with the condition and restless humour of the Jews under his reign. The first is one of the most important: it was issued upon occasion of Joseph, who had abandoned the synagogue to embrace Christianity. The Jews, incensed by his conversion, went to insult him in his house; and finding that he read the gospel, forced his book from him, loaded him with abuses and blows, and dragged him to the synagogue, where they unmercifully scourged him. But not content with this first outrage, they pushed him into the river Cydnus, whose current carried him far enough to give them the joyful hopes that he was drowned. But God preserved him. He received baptism, made himself known at court, and obtained the emperor's leave to build temples in several places where none had been erected before. The Jews were settled at Diocæsarea, Tiberias, Nazareth, and Capernaum, and had so appropriated these cities to themselves, as not to admit any strangers, not excepting the Samaritans, who professed the same religion. Joseph undertook to introduce the Christian religion into all these cities, and to that effect built churches in them.

The Jews, however, were still powerful in Judæa, under Constantine's empire, since they alone possessed four cities, one of which was Nazareth. Their numbers rendered them insolent; and they abused those that had turned Christians, and publicly opposed the execution of the prince's orders for the building of temples.

This doubtless obliged Constantine to publish the edict before-mentioned. "He taxed them with stoning or burning whoever had a mind to renounce their religion;" and he condemned them to the same punishment, with all their accomplices. Herein we still see the footsteps of that furious zeal which they thought authorized them to kill those who were taken in a notorious crime. They imagined these were the precepts of the oral law, and said, that Phineas had executed the verbal order of Moses. They produced another example under the Maccabees, when Matthias killed a Jew, who was practising heathen ceremonies. The doctors authorized this practice; for Philo doubted not but God had established it. The Essenes, those austere votaries, ordered, that if any man had blasphemed against Moses, he should be killed. Josephus says, that they "punished him with death." The interpreter has improperly translated it, they "condemned him to death." For as this sect had no power of life and death, it punished blasphemers by a motion of zeal. Notwithstanding the terrible disorders, and the torrents of blood that the zealots had caused to flow at Jerusalem, yet this dangerous maxim was still preserved: and the Misnah teaches, that if any one "renounces the foundation," (that is, the articles of faith,) he ought to be killed; and, pursuant to this principle, they stoned, burnt, and drowned those that deserted them in Constantine's reign. This obliged him to repress that violence; and as they did not obey the first law, he was forced to make a second.

He also forbade the Christians to turn Jews, upon pain of an arbitrary punishment. There was more danger in point of slaves, who might be brought over by their masters; and therefore this prince published a law, six months before his death, prohibiting the Jews to circumcise those in their service; and giving liberty to all who accused their master of having circumcised them, or that embraced Christianity.

Several laws are enacted by the same emperor.

Constantine farther ordered, that the Jews might be made decurions, because it was fit that they should have their share in the public burthens: but he exempted the patriarchs and priests, and those that had considerable employments in the synagogues, because, being taken up by their functions, they could not attend to the duties of those offices. For, indeed, the post of decurion was not an honour, but a servitude. Every one endeavoured to be discharged from it, by taking other employments in the army and government. They endeavoured to exempt themselves by some privilege which they begged of the emperor. Constantine granted so many of them, that there was nobody left to fill these posts in Julian's time, which obliged him to revoke them all without exception; and this raised murmurs against him, even after his death, whilst others commended him for it. No wonder, then, that Constantine, who did not love the Jews, made decurions of them. Such was the condition of the Jews under the first Christian prince.

Under his reign is placed the council of Elvira, which made two decrees against the Jews of Spain, in which country they had great correspondence with the Christians. They eat and lived sociably together; but the council forbade this table society, upon pain of excommunication to those that eat with a Jew. The punishment was grievous, and absurdly inflicted, since eating together is an action purely civil; and excommunication ought not to be issued, except for ecclesiastical crimes. The learned commentator of the council of Elvira pretends, that the council of Nice ordered the same thing in one of its decrees, which had been dictated by Osius, who was president of it, and who was for having the discipline received in the Spanish churches, and admitted into all others. Mendoza is mistaken; for the canon he quotes was never made by the council of Nice. He took it from the Arabians, who have falsely imputed to this council many canons it never made. Nor do we know what the Arabians mean by quoting the apostles in their decree; for St. Paul was so far from condemning the commerce of civil society, that he made himself "all things to all men; a Jew to the Jews, and a Greek to the Greeks." If we have recourse to the canons that bear the names of these holy men, we shall only find, that they condemned usury, without forbidding eating and society with the Jews. Recardoe, who renewed the decree of the Elviran council, and supported it with his authority, grounded also upon the authority of St. Paul, who says, that "All things are impure to the defiled and unbelieving." From whence he concluded, that the Jews being impure, their meats must be so too: but this is a weak and inconclusive argument.

The same council, by another decree, forbade "the possessors of lands to suffer their fruits to be blessed by the Jews, because their benediction frustrated that of the Christians; and it threatened absolutely to cast out of the church such as should not obey it." This custom of blessing the fruits of the earth, at certain seasons, was common to Pagans and Jews, as well as Christians. But who would have imagined that the latter should have made use of either of the former, if this decree had not informed us of it? However, this and the other decree plainly shew that the Jews had lived very peaceably in Spain, and in good harmony with the Christians, till that time, whatever they may have done since.

The Jews enjoyed a no less benign sunshine in the east, and their academies went on in a flourishing manner, if we except the persecution raised against one of their greatest doctors. This was the famous Ravana, or Rabba Nachmanides, head of the academy of Sora. They mention two famous men of that name, one ancient and the other modern. The latter lived in the 474; but the other died before the council of Nice, in 322. He was so esteemed, that they reckon twelve thousand disciples in his academy. He was commonly called the Remover of Mountains. Not that he had power to work miracles, and convey mountains into the midst of the sea, but so profound was his knowledge as to solve the greatest difficulties. He wrote a book that was in great esteem whilst he lived, and after his death. It was a commentary upon the first book of Moses, containing the history of the Holy Land, with the literal and mystical sense. The title of it was Bereschit Rabba. It must not be confounded with another work of the same name, which is a commentary upon the Misnah of Judah the Saint, composed by one of his disciples.

Ravana, having long taught in the academies of Babylon, was accused of divers crimes by the king of Persia. The fear of being taken, and condemned to death, obliged him to fly, and conceal himself; and he died in his retreat. It is said he was committed prisoner, and that Sapor was about to condemn him, but that the empress, his mother, sent to tell him, that "he should have nothing to do with that Jew, because she had suffered much on his account." However, this persecution was not general; for the academies flourished at Babylon, and the neighbouring parts.

Ravana left a nephew, whom he stiled Avii, for two reasons: one was, that he meant to signify that he had been an orphan, and that he had entertained him out of charity; the other was, that he would not have him go by the name of his grandfather Nachman, lest afterwards the nephew should be confounded with the uncle, and the disciple with the master. He made such proficiency by Ravana's lectures, as to become head of the academy of Pumbedita, in the year 325, which he governed till 339. At the latter end of his life he married a widow, by whom he had a son, who is known by the name of Rau Bibi.

There was also a professor in the academy of Sora, called Joseph of Great Light, or Saghi Nahoi. He was blind; nevertheless he was a man of great knowledge. He was also surnamed Sinai, because he knew to perfection all the traditions that had been given Moses upon Sinai. He is supposed to be the author of the Chaldee paraphrases upon some of the holy penmen, the Psalms, the Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Ruth, and Esther. This paraphrase is highly esteemed, if we judge of it by the number of its particular editions.

At the close of Constantine's reign, the Jews, who were potent at the court of Persia, revenged themselves for what they suffered in the Roman empire, by raising a cruel persecution against the Christians of the east.

The gospel had some time before reached Armenia. We are told that one of its kings, called Tiridates, had embraced Christianity. From thence it passed on to the Persians, who had great correspondence with the Armenians. They began to build churches, and to consecrate priests. There was also a bishop for the two cities of Seleucia and Ctesiphon, which were the most considerable of the country. The Jews were numerous there, because, as Jerome observes, they lived quiet and undisturbed, and were persecuted by none of the Persian kings. Being jealous of the progress of Christianity, they murmured: but when they saw Ustazades, one of Sapor's principal eunuchs, turn Christian, they no longer observed any bounds, and made a league with the Magi. Simeon, bishop of Ctesiphon, was accused of criminal correspondence with Constantine, which was enough to destroy him. This bishop refused to worship the sun and the king, when he was brought at the foot of his throne. "I bent my knee formerly (said he) before your majesty because I did it voluntarily, and it was a civil homage; but I cannot do it when you make it an act of religion, and would make me renounce my God." The king, being enraged, caused him to be chained in a dungeon. The Jews and the Magi, taking advantage of this opportunity, pulled down all the Christian churches. The persecution was long and bloody. Ustazades, an old eunuch of Sapor, and eminent for his services, was also one of the first martyrs.

The sons of Constantine were much severer than their father had been. Constantius coming to the empire, was obliged to make war against them. This prince must have been moved by the disorders the Jews had committed at Alexandria, when Gregory, the Cappadocian, went to succeed St. Athanasius. Joining with the heathens, who were then numerous in this great city, they burnt the sacred books, and profaned the baptisteries in so indecent a manner, that St. Athanasius durst not speak it. Their insolence went so far as to force the virgins they had stripped to abjure their religion. In all these indignities they were countenanced by the before-mentioned bishop, who was then in high favour at court, so that they went on with the utmost boldness and impunity.

The inhabitants of Diocæsarea thought they might safely rise during Magnetius's revolt. This rebel was of the same persuasion as Constantius, since we find his medals have the Laborum, or church-banner; though Baronius supposes him to have dissembled, and cherished heathenism in his heart like Julian, because he revoked all the edicts published against the idolaters in the places he was master of. The Jews could expect nothing from him, especially since it was in the west that his rebellion had the greatest footing. But as he was powerful, and his troops had often been successful, the emperor was obliged to go personally into Hungary to encounter him. The Persians, taking advantage of his absence, took up arms, and attacked Nisibis, which sustained a four months siege. The Jews, seeing the fire kindled at both ends of the empire, could not forbear making use of such a favourable conjuncture.

Diocæsarea is a city but little known, situate in the second Palestine. Mention is made of three cities of this name, one in Cappadocia, another in Phrygia, and a third in Isauria, since John, bishop of Diocæsarea in Isauria, subscribed in the council of Chalcedon. But the geographers, the learned Holstenius not excepted, generally forget that of Judæa. Scaliger confounds it with another city of Palestine, called Geth, in the neighbourhood of Gaza. This learned man's error, which has been often copied, proceeded from his not understanding Jerome. This father says, that Geth was but a mile and an half from Sepphoris, called at present Diocæsarea. This father speaks of Sepphoris, and he was thought to speak of Geth. Sepphoris had been famous, and the Romans made it a metropolis, when Agrippa II. was put in possession of Tiberias, which occasioned great jealousies and disputes betwixt these two cities. It retained its name till the empire of Trajan. As, after the taking of Jerusalem, a great number of Jews were retired to Sepphoris and Tiberias, the heathens and Christians, who continued with them in these two cities, suffered much in their revolt against Adrian, in which the rebels put all to the sword that came to their hands: when, therefore, the emperor had delivered them from their insults, they testified their acknowledgements with emulation. Those of Tiberias built a temple we have spoken of, which they called Adrianion; and Sepphoris relinquished its ancient name to be called Diocæsarea Adriana, or Diocæsarea.

Though great slaughter had been made of the Jews in this country, yet they still got together there, under the following princes, in such numbers, that, in Constantine's time, they were the only inhabitants, and suffered nobody else of whatever religion to settle there. It is no wonder then that this was the rendezvous of the malecontents under Constantians; and that the inhabitants of this city were the forwardest to arm, when they understood that Magnentius obliged the emperor to march with his troops into Hungary, and that the Persians made a great diversion in the east.

But Gallus, whom Constantians had created Cæsar, and commissioned to march against the Persians, came into Judæa, beat the rebels, and razed Diocæsarea, which had been the seat of their rebellion. Nevertheless, this city raised its head again, and the Jews settled in it.

Constantians being incensed against the Jews, and being withal zealous for the Christian religion, made some laws against them. There is, says St. Hillary, who lived at that time, an edict of the emperor, which hinders them at present from entering into Jerusalem. He makes them perambulate the walls of that great city without entering it. They complained to Julian, when he came to the throne, of this hard usage, in being excluded the gates of a city which had been the residence of their ancestors for many ages. All this is an argument that Constantians had renewed Adrian's edicts, or had made new ones upon the same subject. This prince also made it death for a Jew to marry a Christian, or to circumcise a slave. He also prohibited their having Christians in their service; and especially forbade, under great punishments, the embracing their religion. So that if they had liberty of conscience for themselves and posterity, they were not permitted to receive proselytes when they offered themselves. He loaded them likewise with taxes, and had projected new pecuniary edicts against them when he died.

It was under this reign that Epiphanius was converted from Judaism to Christianity; not (as related) without the interposition of some extraordinary circumstances, with which we shall not trouble our readers, since they were not powerful enough to keep him from running into the wild notions of the sect of Gnostics, whom he met with in Egypt.

Julian was much more favourable than Constantians. This prince had no reason to love the Jews, who worshipped but one God, and abominated the heathen idolatry; but he was glad to augment the number of the enemies of Christianity, which he thought most formidable, and to set all religions at war, that paganism might triumph in the midst of these conflicts. He discharged the circumcised from the taxes wherewith Constantians had loaded them. He wrote to them, and in his letter honoured their patriarch with the style of brother; which is a proof they were then considerable in the empire. He gave them liberty to sacrifice, and rebuild the temple at Jerusalem, because they represented to him that they could not offer sacrifice out of the Holy Land.

They availed themselves of the emperor's protection to insult the Christians; for they assembled in many cities of Judæa and Syria, pulled down their temples at Gaza, Alcalon, and Berytus, and demolished two at Damascus. Those of Egypt did the same thing, and the most magnificent of all the temples of Alexandria was destroyed. They fell to re-building the temple of Jerusalem: but this event, which historians relate with many attendant circumstances, deserves to be particularly noticed.

The emperor not only authorized the building of the temple of Jerusalem, but also furnished them with materials and money. Jerome, speaking of the Jews of his time, says, they imagined that, four hundred and thirty years after their dispersion, they were to become masters of the Romans, sell them to the Sabeans, rebuild Jerusalem, and restore it to its primitive glory; and that the boroughs and neighbouring cities, not excepting Sodom itself, should be rebuilt. This they grounded upon several oracles, promising that God would revenge his people of their enemies, and rebuild Sion. When they saw Julian solicitous for their labouring upon this structure, they fancied the promises accomplished. They insultingly asked the Christians, whether they would cause gold and silver tools to be made to work upon this new edifice. The women and children lent a helping hand; and the heathens themselves assisted them in the restoration of the temple.

But at length an effectual stop was put to it, by such a series of prodigies as quite deterred them from pursuing it, and made them sensible of the infallibility of Christ's predictions against that place. Dreadful earthquakes, and eruptions of fire from the ground, interrupted the workmen when digging for the foundation of the new temple, together with a variety of other contingencies, as are set forth at large in the celebrated performance of Bishop Warburton.

Julian, who had permitted the re-building of the temple, before he departed for Persia, carried his conquests very far. He found there a part of the ten tribes, which possessed an entire city. Historians observe, that this prince, being arrived at Mesene, which is an island made by the Tigris, where Apamea bore a considerable rank, marched towards a place where the Euphrates divides itself into many channels, and found a city called Bithra, which was inhabited by the Jews, who had abandoned it, because the walls were not strong or high enough to sustain a siege. This city had been considerable in the Persian empire, since the emperor's palace, and houses to lodge a garrison, were still seen in it. Julian's army seeing it deserted, set fire to it, and reduced it to ashes. It cannot be doubted but these were Jews of the ten tribes dispersed in the east, since they were situated between the channels of the Euphrates. They were numerous and potent there, as they possessed an entire city. They were also faithful to their prince; for they rather chose to forsake all, than to wait and receive the Romans, who would have profited by their stay.

A city inhabited by the ten tribes in the east.

Julian being killed in this war, Jovian, his successor, was obliged to check the insolence this prince's countenance had infused both into the heathens and Jews of the Roman empire. This he did; but his reign was so short, that they looked upon it only as a fleeting cloud; and the rather, because Valens restored entire liberty of conscience to all the enemies of the Christian religion, heathens, Jews, and heretics. He did something more; for Valentinian and he maintained the Jews and their patriarchs in the possession of all their privileges. The law of those two princes is lost; but since Arcadius supports himself with their example in confirming all these privileges, it cannot be doubted but they made it. However, Valens abolished one of their greatest advantages, since he submitted them to public offices, and revoked the preceding decrees that had exempted them. This prince's words are remarkable, because they shew that the clergy was not so far privileged as is at present imagined. "The edict upon which the Jews flatter themselves

“felves that they are exempted from the offices of court, is voided by these presents; for even the clergy are not allowed to consecrate themselves to the service of God, without having first paid what is due to their country; and he that will truly give himself to God, ought to furnish a man to fill up his place in public offices.”

Though Theodosius had not revoked this law of Valens, which was executed in the reign of Arcadius, yet the Jews continued happy enough at that time. Maximus rebelling in the east, and obliging Valentinian to implore the protection of Theodosius, who was then in Illyricum, thought it most expedient to gain the Jews, and bring them over to his interests. He not only favoured them, but understanding that the people had burnt one of their synagogues at Rome, he ordered it to be rebuilt. Indeed, Maximus's reign was short. Theodosius having often beat his troops, caused his head to be cut off at Aquileia, and came afterwards to Milan, where Valentinian and he revoked all they had decreed. But as the rebuilding of the synagogue at Rome was a particular ordinance, and Theodosius was persuaded the Jews ought not to be deprived of their religious places, it is doubted whether he annulled that relating to the Jews.

St. Ambrose was, indeed, very inveterate against the Jews, and strenuously opposed the rebuilding another synagogue in lieu of that which the Christians had let on fire at Callinicum, and which Theodosius had ordered to be rebuilt at their charge; but what Zonaras, a Greek monk, and some other writers of later date, say of his preaching before him, taking him to task, and reproaching him for suffering the Jews to enjoy the privilege of their synagogues in his capital, is all entirely false and absurd. He did not preach, but write, to him; and his letter is still preserved, importing that they were so far from thinking themselves obliged to observe the Roman law, that they thought it a crime to submit to them.

The contrary, however, appears, by all that we have hitherto said of the edicts made for and against them; and much more by the new law which that prince published, in the last year of his life, against the untimely zeal of some Christians, who, under pretence of religion, plundered and demolished their synagogues, contrary to the laws which allowed them liberty of conscience, and for punishing such offenders for the future. He even granted them a particular jurisdiction, on account of the frequent law-suits which they had either among themselves, or with the Christians, by which they were not only free from the trouble and charge of seeking for justice from strange tribunals, but were likely more easily to obtain it from judges that were maintained by themselves; all which privileges would hardly have been granted them, if, as is pretended to have been alledged by St. Ambrose, they had looked upon it as a crime to submit to the laws of the empire.

St. Jerome had not the same prejudice against the doctors of this nation as St. Ambrose; for, on the contrary, he paid them a pension, and made use of their instruction for understanding the Hebrew tongue, and the Holy Scriptures. This father, who thought that he had taken too much pleasure in reading Cicero and Virgil, (you are not a Christian, but a Ciceronian, said a judge to him,) changed his opinion for the Hebrews, learned their language with difficulty, consulted their doctors, studied under them, and made use of them to compose a Latin version of the Scripture.

He acquaints us, That, to restrain the fallies of his youth, he put himself under the discipline of a young Hebrew, that had turned Christian, and underwent very uncommon labour to learn a strange language.

He was not contented with the instruction of this converted Jew, but took another, who so passionately loved him, that he fetched the books from the synagogue, under pretence of reading them, and brought them to his disciple. This master was an ingenious man, and St. Jerome has quoted some of his explications. He sent for a third from Tiberias, whom he employed to revise, by the Hebrew, his version of the Chronicles, which he had made from the Septuagint. He says that this new master was admired by the synagogue. He sent for a fourth from Lydda, whom he paid very dear, because he was a learned man, and interpreted the traditions in the synagogue. It was this rabbin that helped him to translate the book of Job. He had occasion for new assistance to understand Daniel and Tobias, because of the Chaldee expressions that are scattered in these books. But as he laboured with great assiduity, he employed but one day in the translation of Tobias; which a rabbin, equally skilled in the Chaldee and Hebrew, dictated to him.

St. Jerome grew so much the haughtier from these assistances which he had drawn from the synagogue; because this erudition, which was new, and almost unknown in the Christian church, distinguished him from the rest of the priests, and even from the bishops, who hardly knew any more than their mother tongue. In doing some justice to his masters, he boasted of his own skill and understanding of the Scripture. St. Austin, who did not love him, admired him as a prodigy, because he understood three languages. An author, who has taken his name, adds, that St. Jerome understood the language of the Greeks, the Hebrews, the Chaldeans, the Persians, the Medes, the Arabians, and of all nations. The moderns have gone farther than the ancients; and because this Father understood the holy tongue, they have espoused his observations as those of an almost infallible commentator.

Equitable conduct of Theodosius the Younger. His pious and liberal disposition. The synagogues destroyed in Macedonia. A remarkable impostor in the island of Candia. Many Jews embrace Christianity. The Jews raise a tumult in Alexandria. Riot and murder the effects of party zeal. Bishop Cyril censured for his violent proceedings. The patriarchal dignity suppressed.

MOST of the edicts which the Christian emperors had published in the fourth century were enforced in the succeeding. Some of them were renewed, and others added, that were thought necessary to check the Jews' insolence against the Christian religion. Theodosius the Younger was obliged to remedy this mischief; but he always did it in an equitable manner, for he only punished those who had deserved it by their crimes. In the beginning of this century new troubles sprang up in Macedonia and Dacia. On the one hand the Jews of these countries continued to insult the Christian religion; and, on the other, the Christians burnt their houses and synagogues, and even sometimes condemned the Jews to death, for no other crime than their religion. Theodosius, who was always equitable, condemned this oppression of the Jews, forbade the magistrates to punish them for religion, and not suffer the edifices belonging to them to be burnt, on condition that, on their part, they would not violate the respect that was due to the prevailing church. But yet the inhabitants of Inmestar, three years after, fell into an excess. Debauchery prevailed over the respect that was due to the prince's laws; for they fastened a young Christian to a gibbet, and scourged him so cruelly, that he died. The Christians of that country, enraged at such a barbarous outrage, ran to arms. The battle was violent, because the Jews were numerous. The governor of the province giving Theodosius information of it, he sent orders to chastise the guilty, and the tumult was appeased by their punishment.

Theodosius, who spent the winter at Constantinople, (in the year 425,) made many edicts there; one one of which forbade the celebrating games and spectacles on Easter Sunday, and during the principal feasts of the year. The Jews and heathens might have alledged, that this decree did not relate to them; but the emperor declared, that they were subject to the law; and told them, there was a time for devotion, and another for pleasure. They thought to excite the prince's jealousy, by complaining, that this mistaken devotion hindered the people from crowning and saluting the emperor's statues: but Theodosius put himself above that, and declared, it was honouring of him to do service to God. However, we see that this relic of heathenism was still retained in this prince's reign, of saluting the emperor's statues, and inserting the title of Numen in the laws.

Those that profess the predominant religion, are apt to imagine that every thing is lawful to them. They think that they signalize their zeal in proportion to the outrages they commit, and, under this notion, prescribe no bounds to their passion. It is the highest prudence, in kings, to restrain these excesses, and to cherish the public peace, by punishing an inordinate zeal. But this is not commonly done; and those who, from being convinced of its necessity, undertake it, do not always succeed. They often render their religion suspected, expose themselves to the raileries of the people, and incur an odium.

Synagogues
destroyed.

The Christians, in Theodosius's empire, pulled down the synagogues, without any other reason than their hatred to this religion. If a private person thought himself affronted by a Jew, immediately he engaged the populace in his interest; and the next thing was to run in shoals to the synagogue, and set it on fire. This was often done in Macedonia: and the emperor was obliged to represent to his subjects, that it was not lawful for private persons to do themselves justice; that there were tribunals appointed to hear their grievances, and to judge of their complaints; and that he had commanded the judges of that country to take cognizance of them. The ecclesiastics, accustomed to religious broils, joined with the people: those of Antioch, where the Jews were numerous and rich, plundered the synagogue, and thought to sanctify the theft by consecrating the booty to the church. Complaints were made of so scandalous a conduct, which were so reasonable, that they were backed by the prefect of the prætorium, who gave informations of the disorder, and the occasions that had produced it. Theodosius condemned the clergy to restore what they had taken, or the value; and ordered a place to be assigned the Jews to build a temple. The decree was equitable, since the Jews lived in the empire upon the public faith of the edicts. But it did not seem so to Simeon Stylites, who was then alive, and violently espoused the interests of the clergy, and the mutineers of Antioch: he wrote so pressingly in their favour to Theodosius, that he not only revoked the orders he had given, but cashiered the prefect who had advised him to punish the robbers. This favour, which Theodosius granted upon his request, not only encouraged the Christians of Antioch, but those of the cities and neighbouring provinces, to make new assaults upon the synagogues. They were obliged to have recourse to Theodosius, to obtain some security against these frequent insults. This prince, who was an enemy to violence, forbade them doing any. The Christians were disgusted at it: they resumed the charge against the Jews, and complained, that the emperor's protection had rendered them insolent. In explication of the preceding decrees, it was said, that, in answering the sad and doleful complaints of the Jews, it was designed to screen them from the persecution that some turbulent spirits exercised on them, under pretence of religion, and to prohibit the burning of their churches; but, at the same time, it was declared that, if they had nothing to fear for the temples they were in possession of, it was not lawful for them to build new ones; and that death should be inflicted on all those that undertook the circumcising of a Christian. There were still Christians, at that time, that embraced Judaism; for laws were only made against reigning abuses; and it was difficult for the Jews to enforce circumcision on a Christian, if he was not disposed to submit to it.

The losses of the church were repaired by an accident that happened, in the year 434, in the island of Candia, where there were a great many rich Jews, the greatest part whereof were converted, after they had been grossly deceived by an impostor. His name was Moses; and he pretended to be the ancient law-giver of the people, who descended from heaven to procure them a glorious deliverance, by leading them through the sea, to return to the Land of Promise, as they had done when they left Egypt. We cannot conceive how a man could be so frantic as to attempt such a deception, or to persuade himself that he was able to effect it. But yet Socrates affirms, that he not only had this imagination, but also, that he had, in one year, run over all the cities and villages of the island, and persuaded the inhabitants into a belief of it. The infatuation was so great, that, in expectation of the day appointed to throw themselves into the sea, the ploughman neglected the tillage of his fields, and the proprietors abandoned the possession of their lands and houses to the first comer; every one contenting himself with taking what he could carry away. This pseudo Moses, having mustered up his flock upon the top of a rock, the first at hand threw themselves into the water, without any wavering of faith: the women and children plunged themselves in with equal ardour. But it was quickly perceived that their abettor was an impostor; for some were drowned; and others were saved by the Christian fishermen, who happened to be there with their barks, and went to acquaint their brethren how near their credulity had been to cost them their lives. They attempted to seize the impostor, but he had disappeared. In consequence of this, many Jews embraced Christianity; most of them grew wise; and all were ashamed of putting so much confidence in so distinguished an impostor.

An impostor
of Candia.

There were other adventures that happened in the reign of Theodosius. A Jew of Constantinople, who had been paralytic for many years, and baffled the art of the physicians, thought he might recover the use of his limbs if he were baptized, and therefore desired this ordinance. Atticus, the patriarch, caused him to be instructed; he received baptism, and coming out of the baptismal font, found himself cured. This extraordinary cure made so great an impression upon the Jews and heathens, that great numbers became converts; though the far greater part of the former still continued in their unbelief.

As we are writing the history of the Jews, and not that of the church, we shall pass over a number of those very strange conversions with which this century abounded, and only observe, that the Christians, having then accustomed themselves to make considerable presents to new converts, induced many Jews not only to become Christians with that view alone, but even to run privately from one sect to another, and be baptized in them all for the sake of obtaining fresh tokens of their liberality.

Frauds exercised under the mask of religion.

Socrates, in his ecclesiastical history, gives us a remarkable instance of a Jew, who went through all the sects then at Constantinople; but was at length discovered, in a singular manner, by the Novatian bishop there, and owned that he had been baptized by every one but that. These cheats could not but render the Jews obnoxious to the Christians: but there was still another consideration that made them more so. This was the several arch-heretics, such as the Novatians, Nestorians, &c. who, by borrowing some of the Jewish tenets, were stiled Judaizers and Jews.

The Jews in the city of Alexandria, who amounted to upwards of 100,000, were mutinous and seditious; and the hatred they cherished against the Christian religion tended to sharpen and exasperate their turbulent disposition: so that commotions frequently happened in this great city, and seldom ended without bloodshed. Sabbaths were noted as so many days of battle; because the Jews, who devoted this day to idleness and debauchery, instead of going to the synagogue, sought occasion to signalize themselves; and the Christians and heathens commonly insulted them when they went to the synagogue. There were also public shews upon that day; and the Jews chose rather to be there than at their devotions, whereupon the people that flocked thither often engaged in quarrels with them. They used to come to blows, and the governors had seldom sufficient authority to restrain these riots. One day Orestes, the governor of Alexandria, was in the theatre, intending to make some political regulations in the entertainments. He designed, perhaps, by good laws, to prevent the disorders which had been attended with such fatal consequences to the public peace and good of the city. But he was mistaken; for, he was attempting it, it was perceived, that he was surrounded by the party of Cyril, bishop of the place. It was suspected that they came only there to incense the governor, and dictate to him some ordinance against the Jews. The presence of Hierax, who was only an usher of the lower classes, but one of Cyril's hired flatterers, who used to applaud this bishop as he preached, served to provoke them; inasmuch, that they cried aloud, that that man, whom they looked upon as their enemy, was come only to insult them, and to raise sedition. He must have given occasion for these complaints, since the governor caused him to be seized by his officers, and scourged upon the stage, without any form of trial. Cyril was not a man that would bear such an insult from the prefect, whom he mortally hated. Instead of complaining to him of his injustice, (if it was true that he had been guilty of any,) he sent for some Jews to his palace, and threatened them. They despised the threatnings of an ecclesiastic whom the governor openly opposed, and even resolved to massacre the Christians. In order to this design, a body of the conspirators ran along the streets in the night, crying that the principal church of the Christians at Alexandria was on fire. The crowd burst forth, without arms, to extinguish it. The Jews, who had a mark to distinguish themselves, killed them as fast as they came. Cyril, having notice of it, came out with a multitude of people, entered into all the synagogues, appropriated them to the church, gave up the houses to be plundered, and drove the Jews quite naked out of the city. The governor was highly enraged, because the bishop encroached upon the jurisdiction of the officers of the empire; and because he saw this great city almost unpeopled by such a general expulsion of the Jews. He informed the court of it, whilst Cyril also sent his complaints against the Jews. The people sided with the governor against their patriarch, and obliged him to go and sue for peace to Orestes, who refused to be reconciled.

Cyril brought religion into the affair, and went to the governor with the gospel in his hand, to oblige him, upon sight of that book, to a reconciliation: but Orestes being inflexible in his resentment, Cyril, who had a troop of soldiers, in the habit of monks, ordered them all down from the mountains of Nitris. These anchorites were never seen to descend, but they put the people into a consternation. They marched down that day to the number of fifteen hundred; and observing the governor, as he went into his chariot, began to load him with abuse, and accused him of being an heathen, that they might have a pretence to get rid of him, under a shew of justice. It was in vain for him to cry out, that he had been baptized at Constantinople. Instead of hearing him, they fell upon him with showers of stones, wounded him on the head, and covered him with blood. His guards deserted him, being oppressed by numbers; and the governor would have been left to perish, if the people had not run to his assistance. Ammonius, one of the rioters, was arrested, and condemned to punishment. Orestes wrote to the court. Cyril, on his part, justified the proceedings of the monks, by declaring Ammonius a martyr, and making his panegyric in the pulpit on the man who died for so glorious an action. The tumult began some time after, and Cyril was loaded with all the odium of the event, in which the celebrated Hypatia, an heathen virgin, of great sense, learning, and virtue, lost her life, whom this bishop, jealous of his reputation, had caused to be assassinated.

It is in vain to extol Cyril of Alexandria, and to make him one of the principal saints of the purest church. People suffer themselves to be easily dazzled in favour of some men, and canonize those who have been actuated by violent and criminal passions, instead of a regular devotion. It is owned, that Cyril incurred Orestes's hatred by his ambition, and encroachment upon the authority of the imperial officers. How did he take his revenge on him? He caused him to be assassinated by the monks. Is this conduct consistent with the character of a bishop? But he stops not here: he again brings his officers, like so many assassins, against a virtuous, amiable fair one, who unmercifully killed her at a church-door. Socrates had reason to say, that this action involved Cyril and his ecclesiastics in shame and confusion. This same prelate had drawn upon him the people's hatred; since they always engaged against him, notwithstanding their reverence for religion and sacred persons. How could they esteem an ambitious prelate, who hired people to applaud his sermons in public, as Cyril did, and who afterwards acted the votary, and crowned a seditious monk, who had been punished for his crimes, with martyrdom? We cannot justify his conduct against the Jews, since they were not of his jurisdiction: it belonged to the governor to expel them the city, if he thought it expedient; and the bishop was no judge of their privileges and settlements. It was a perfect rapine to head a rabble, to plunder their synagogues, and appropriate them to themselves, with their houses and effects. It was uncharitable to the last degree, to expel people quite naked, who had lived there ever since the time of Alexander the Great, under the protection of edicts.

The Jewish nation received a severe blow in this century in the total suppression of their patriarchs; for their way of living raised murmurs and complaints against them, and the taxes they levied upon the nation occasioned their fall. We have already spoken of their privileges; and have only to add, that Theodosius and Valentinian deprived them of that income, and appropriated an impost made upon their subjects to the imperial treasury. By this means the patriarchal dignity was more effectually suppressed than if it had been annulled by any edict, so that, for want of competent support, it dwindled away. Photius pretends that the primates, who succeeded the patriarchs, were charged with this collection, answerable for it, and obliged to see it conveyed into the treasury.

Thus was the patriarchal dignity absolved in the year 429.

CHAP. X.

State of the Jews, in the western empire, under Honorius. Equitable law of Honorius respecting the Jews. He deprives them of the office of agents. Determination of Severus to convert the Jews. State of the Jews under the Vandals in Africa. Their privileges confirmed by Valentinian. The Jews protected by Theodoric, king of the Goths.

HONORIUS, who possessed the western part of the empire, was harassed with many revolts. Never did prince master so many tyrants; and therefore we see him, in most of his medals, holding a labarum in one hand, a victory in the other, and trampling a rebel under his feet. St. Chrysostom, who derived this prince's glory from hence, did not ascertain the character of heroes; for it is most commonly the weakness or cruelty of the governor that excites rebellions; and it is no great honour for for a prince to see his subjects vanquished, and in chains at his feet. The zealots persuade themselves, that his victories were the recompence of his vehemence against the sectaries. It is true he sometimes persecuted them; but he shewed great equity to the Jews who lived in his dominions. There is even a law preserved, made upon their account, which is an honour to him; for he declares, "That the glory of a prince consists in permitting every society quietly to enjoy the privileges they have acquired; and that, though a religion is not approved by a sovereign, yet he ought to preserve its privileges." Pursuant to these maxims, he decreed, that none could destroy or appropriate the synagogues with impunity. He even forbade them to violate the sabbath, under pretence of the public good, and service of the state; because the rest of the week was sufficient to satisfy the necessities of the empire.

Equitable law of Ho-norius respecting the Jews.

He deprives them of the office of agents.

Nevertheless, to prevent the abuse of their liberty, he forbade the building of synagogues, and deprived the professors of it of offices in the militia, and of that of agents. The agents were distinguished in the militia, having three sorts of employments; to raise taxes in the provinces, to convey bread to the magazines and army for the subsistence of the troops, and to be spies and couriers to the princes. Augustus had appointed these inspectors in every province and region: they brought an account of all that was done to the prince, and to this purpose had the disposal of the public carriages. Honorius deprived the Jews of this employ, who were, at that time, commissioned to furnish the magazines, as they are at this day in some states.

This prince severely restrained the sect of the Cœlicolæ, who had no image of the deity in their temples: they prayed to God in open places, and on flat roofs: they neglect the temples, (says Tertullian,) and make their prayers upon the banks in the air. They swore by the heaven. It is said, that this more particularly agrees with the Samaritans, who had formerly an oratory near Napolouffe, built in the form of a theatre, where they went to pay their devotions. Besides, they had a baptism like the sectaries we speak of. They were called Cœlicolæ, because they read the Bible in Hebrew. Scaliger thought it was a sect of the Essenes that bore the name of Cœlicolæ, or angels, by reason of the angelical life they led. And thus, in the latter ages, the monks have been intitled Cœlicolæ, as if they had led the life of heavenly citizens whilst they were upon earth.

It called Schamain.

There was another sect in this nation, called Schamain, or the Heavens. Benjamin of Tudela found it in Egypt; and it had so much resemblance to that of the Cœlicolæ, that it is very probable it was a remainder of those who were condemned in the Theodosian code. It has been further maintained, that they were apostates, who forsook Christianity, and turned Jews.

It is
a sect.

Honorius looks upon these heretics as people that were but just sprung up in Africa, and whose doctrines he was yet unacquainted with. This character cannot be applied to the Jews, or Samaritans, or Essenes, nor to the apostates that returned to Judaism, whose doctrine, worship, and ceremonies, could not be unknown to the emperor. Besides, the Schamain, which Benjamin of Tudela found in Egypt, were not Cœlicolæ, nor so much as sectaries. This is easily to be observed by any one that reads this traveller with attention; for he distinguishes two different synagogues he saw at Grand Cairo, one whereof belonged to the Jews of the Irack, and the other to the Jews Schamain. As the first name is that of a province from which these Jews came, viz. the Babylonian Irack, from whence they went into Egypt; the second name must also signify a province from whence the Jews who possessed that synagogue proceeded: and Syria is actually called Schamain, and the Syrians, Schamain: or rather, there needed no more than to forsake Arias Montanus's version, and to follow that of the emperor Constantine, which removes all the difficulty. Indeed, Benjamin makes no difference between these two synagogues, except in their manner of dividing their reading, and the sections of the law, which makes no variation in the worship.

Different opinions about the Cœlicolæ.

An ingenious commentator has differed from all the rest, by observing, that the Cœlicolæ are accused, by Honorius, of disturbing the rules of the church; wherefore he suspected they were baptized in the name of heaven, instead of the common form; and by heaven they understand the God that reigns in it. This was the Jews style long ago. They say still, that the name of heaven is profaned; that the fear of heaven is necessary; and that the assembly instituted by heaven shall remain.

These Cœlicolæ, or worshippers of heaven, were in Africa; for it was to the governors of this province that the emperor directed his orders against them. They were all schismatics; for they had their particular assemblies: and Honorius was for reducing them within the pale of the church. These sectaries attacked the sacraments of the Catholick faith, and the worship and veneration of God; all which is an argument, that they were real Donatists; for these latter impugned the sacraments of the church, by re-baptizing those who had been baptized by the orthodox, and by the addition of some ceremonies. St. Austin says, that Major, one of the Cœlicolæ, was searched for, who had invented a new baptism among them, and had seduced many people. Here you have the Cœlicolæ in Africa; and their principal was Major, of the sect of the Donatists, with whom St. Austin would have engaged in a conference, had he not been called away upon the ordination of a bishop. The baptism Major had invented was new, and little known: he had set up new congregations, and misled many people by this new sacrament. St. Austin's passage so perfectly agrees with Honorius's declaration, that the one seems to be a comment of the other.

They departed also from the worship of God; for we know that the Donatists swore by their martyrs as by the only religion, says Optatus. They demonstrated their veneration for them, by admitting their decisions as so many oracles. This is enough to make them pass for Cœlicolæ, since the saints are regarded as the inhabitants of heaven, and they swore by them; which was not done in the Christian church.

This sect is little known because it continued but a short time. And as the Donatists soon vanished after Honorius, the Cœlicolæ, who made but a very small part of these schismatics, quickly disappeared; and therefore we only find their name in St. Austin and the Theodosian code. We find no track of them among the ancients, who have given the catalogue of heresies; and almost all the moderns have forgot them, as well as the ancients.

They must not be confounded with the Jews, because we find them in the Theodosian code under the same title, and included in the same law. Godefroy has judiciously observed, that the law ought to be distinguished into two articles; one whereof relates to the Cœlicolæ, who were obliged to return to the church before a year's end, under pain of being confounded with other heretics; and the other forbids the Jews the making of proscelytes.

They have no analogy to the worship of the synagogue.

It is true, that this learned commentator thought the Cœlicolæ had a worship common with the Jews, who worshipped the heavens and the stars; but since this worship of the ancient idolaters was abolished among the Jews, and the Donatists had a baptism, and a peculiar worship for their martyrs, there is no need of confounding two different religions. And therefore we discharge the synagogue from this new crime, of which it hath hitherto been thought convicted by the laws of Honorius.

Between Africa and Spain is the island of Minorca, in which were two considerable cities: one, where Jews numerous at Minorca, where they exercised the chief offices.

Determination of Severus to convert the Jews.

where the bishop resided, was inaccessible to the Jews: there were neither wolves or wild beasts there; and the serpents, which were very numerous, lost their venom. On the contrary, in the other city, called, at present, Port-Mahon, the Jews were in considerable number, though it was subject to the emperor Honorius, yet they arrived to titles, and exercised all civil dignities: for Theodosius, who was doctor of the law, and head of the synagogue, bore the first rank among the Christians, because he had passed through all the offices.

Severus, being appointed bishop of this island, was easily persuaded by Orosius, who had lately returned from Jerusalem, loaded with singular relics, to undertake the conversion of the Jews. They began with private conferences, and proceeded to public disputes; the last of which was held in their synagogue, where, finding some Jewish women had armed themselves with stones to throw at them, they provided for their own defence. The consequence was, that the synagogue was pulled down, and nothing saved out of it but the books and plate: but the bishop, through the power of oratory, brought their greatest men to relent; and, in about eight days, the greater part of them were converted, and the synagogue turned into a church. Many, however, that remained obdurate, went and hid themselves in caverns, till hunger forced them out; and others, leaving all they had behind them, went and sought an asylum in foreign countries; all which circumstances shew that there was some violence used against them by the bishop and his clergy. Beronius seems to own as much; and adds, that this example would have been followed in many other places, had not the crowned head put a stop to this method of conversion.

State of the Jews under the Vandals in Africa.

The irruption of the Vandals, a barbarous people, who had no notion of toleration in point of religion, was very likely to create them new troubles. But yet it is probable they brought upon this nation only such confusions as are inevitable in great revolutions; for we find in St. Austin's works several tracts composed against the Jews, which shew that their condition was not grown more hard or unhappy here, than in the other parts of the empire.

In the "Plea of the Synagogue against the Christian Church," written by a lawyer of that time, the synagogue alledges, "That she is neither a slave or a servant of the Christians, since they are not committed prisoners; and, instead of wearing irons, and other marks of slavery, they were left the liberty of sailing and merchandizing." The Vandals, therefore, promised them the liberty of professing their religion and trading. But, on the other hand, the church answers, "That she is obliged to pay tribute to the Christians; that a Jew cannot pretend to the empire, nor become a leading man or governor of a province; that he cannot enter into the senate or the camp; and that if he be left the liberty of getting his livelihood, it is only to prevent his dying with hunger."

Valentinian confirms their privileges.

Valentinian confirmed all their privileges at Rome, and in the rest of the empire under his obedience. He left the synagogues remaining, that had been built in the preceding reigns; but at the same time opposed innovations; and understanding they were building a temple, he caused it to be pulled down, and fined the undertaker. When the empire changed its master, and the Goths seized on Italy, the Jews still found protection from these barbarous kings.

Theodoric, king of the Goths, protects the Jews.

Theodoric defended them against the insults of the people. He attended to, and followed, the maxims infused into him by his secretary Cassiodorus, of forcing no one; because all violence in point of religion is criminal. This prince often represented to them, their excessive love of riches, and a temporal rest, whilst they lost immortality. But he would not have them driven into this road by violence, since they obstructed their salvation, when they did not enter it with their whole desire.

He was much affected when he heard, that, to revenge a private quarrel, the synagogue of Rome was burnt. He censured the senate for permitting it, and represented the consequences such a tumult might have had, since the flames of that building, carried by the wind, might have consumed a great part of their city. He also severely reprimanded the ecclesiastics of Milan, who went to seize upon a synagogue and its appurtenances. The Christian religion does not authorize robbery. The citizens of Genoa were going to vacate all the privileges which the Jews possessed, who had been settled there for a long time. The people, fermented by their leaders, mutinied, and went to plunder the synagogue, of which they carried away the roof. The oppressed had recourse to Theodoric, whose equity was known to them. They were not mistaken; for this prince maintained their privileges, and permitted them to rebuild the synagogue, on condition that they would add no ornaments, nor make it larger than it was before. And thus the Jews concluded the fifth century in the Roman empire. They frequently submitted to the hatred and tumults of the people, but still they preserved the best part of their privileges by the authority of the sovereigns.

CHAP. XI.

State of the Jews in Persia, under R. Asce. Method of compiling the Babylonish Talmud. Successors of Asce. Revenues and power of the princes of the captivity. Composition of the Talmud obstructed by persecution. Rise of the Sabureans or Sceptics. A new sect, called Gaonim, or Excellents.

LET us now take a view of the Jews in Persia, during that interval where we find their academies in a flourishing condition, under their famed chief, R. Asce, the compiler of the Babylonish Talmud, lately mentioned. Sora was the place of his birth, and the most celebrated academy of all the east, of which he was chosen president at a very early age.

He invented a new method of instruction; for, instead of fixing his disciples constantly to the college, and reading them lectures all the year, he only did it in the months of February and August. In February he gave his scholars a treatise, and sent them to study at home for six months. They returned in August, and gave an account of their proficiency. The subjects were examined: they disputed in his presence; and afterwards he removed the difficulties by the decisions of preceding doctors.

Ten persons were seated over against him; seven whereof were called Princes of the Crowns, whose office it was to paraphrase upon the dictates of the master, and to make repetitions to the scholars, whose number amounted to 2400. Those that distinguished themselves by their diligence were praised and rewarded. The president made a collection of all the subjects that had been handled, and from this the Babylonian Talmud was composed. He then gave them a subject they were to study the half year following, and so the school broke up.

Asce, having taught in this manner sixty years, published a collection of his decisions, which he divided into four different parts. The first contained the maxims and rules of the Mishnah, with the doubts that might be proposed, and their solutions. In the second he handled divers questions, and related the opinion of the Tannæans and Gemarists about them. The third part consisted of the sentences and maxims that had been published since Judah the Saint: and in the last were all the explications the scripture affords for the determination of differences, with the commentaries of the principal doctors. This was the first division of the Babylonian Talmud. But as R. Asce could not finish his undertaking, those that came into it after him changed changed the method, and made additions, which have rendered it much more confused.

This great doctor died in the year 427. Some make Marimar his successor; but others say, that the feet of R. Hovan hastened; that is, that this master was made president of the academy of Sora, in Asce's place. His son Thobioni (according to the pompous Jewish stile) ascended the throne of his father in the year 455, and reigned thirteen years, during which the nation enjoyed such profound tranquillity, that they called this doctor their Daily Prosperity. He must needs have contributed to their felicity, since they gave him the name of it. We must not be surprized to hear them use the phrases of succession to the throne, and thirteen years reign, though the questions are only about the office of a doctor, or the pedagogue of a school. It is the rabbinical stile to give great ideas of their masters, and to caress them with flattering titles. Those that are unaccustomed to this stile are easily dazzled by it, not imagining that a pedant is placed upon the throne, and that they should expressly say, he reigned thirteen years, when his empire extended no farther than over some scholars, to whom he taught traditions. They also called plain students princes of crowns, because they were the uppermost of a class.

Seeing such a glorious title is given to the scholars, we need not wonder that the princes of the captivity wore it likewise. They entertain lofty notions of these princes, whereas their power was not so considerable as is commonly supposed. The whole nation did not depend on them, as is said, since, as far as the year 429, the patriarchs of Judæa extended their jurisdiction over many provinces; and since that time, the Jews, dispersed in the Roman empire, could not acknowledge a prince residing in the territories of the Persian or Arabian kings, with whom there were continual wars. Would the Grecian emperors, so extremely jealous of their authority, have suffered a foreign Jew to raise taxes upon his subjects, and correspond with them in time of war? This prince's revenues were but small. The doctors say, he obtained of the Persians the privilege of setting up but one judge for the determination of differences between man and man, without being obliged to repair the damage, when the sentence was given wrong; whereas, by the common laws, they were to be judged by three persons. This observation is futile: for it was the Talmudists that fixed the number of these judges to three; and it was impertinent to desire of the king of Persia dispensation from a law which they had voluntarily imposed on themselves. However, the prince established three judges at Nerea, a town half a day's journey from Babylon; and here they paid the Didrachm when they came to be twenty years old. He also punished the violators of the law by fines, which were reserved for the prince. There was such another tribunal at Chaloan, five days journey from Babylon. There was a third at Kesar; and the last at Babylon, where the prince resided: and in all these courts they collected but seven hundred gold crowns, which composed the prince's revenue; and supposing his dignity proportioned to his income, it could not be considerable. By this we discover the reason of the silence of all the historians concerning these heads of the captivity. They say, that all these princes were of the house of David. They assign them a great empire, by which they say the sceptre was preserved in the tribe of Judah. However, these historians, who preserve the succession, the names, and some actions of the doctors, who taught in the schools of Sora, Pundebita, and elsewhere, hardly ever mention the heads of the captivity; and if we discover some names of them, it is not without great uncertainty. R. Asce is highly celebrated; they enumerate his successors in the academy: but in all the fifth century we are examining, we find but one name of a prince of the captivity. It is impossible they should have been so entirely forgotten, if they had performed any important actions in the fifth century, or had been princes, as they are stiled. But to return to the Babylonian Talmud, which the head of the academy composed.

This work was interrupted by the death of Asce, though he left able disciples, that might have finished it. But this interruption was caused by a persecution that lasted seventy-three years: it was violent; for the observation of the sabbath was suppressed, the synagogues were shut up, and the holy houses given to the Magi. The principal doctors of the nation were made prisoners. Animar, Mor, Asce's disciples, and Huna his son, who was prince of the captivity, were condemned to death, and suffered it courageously; but the Jewish youth, more addicted to the pleasures of life, deserted their religion; so that the Jews were severely afflicted towards the end of the fifth century. However, they resumed courage some time after, and the Talmud was accomplished in the year 500.

A persecution puts a stop to the composition of the Talmud.

Towards the end of the same century arose a new sect, called Sebureans, or Sceptics, at the head of which was R. Josi. These doctors pretended to doubt of every thing, and seem to have started up to oppose the infallibility which the Talmudists attributed to the Talmud; but whether by openly questioning its authority, or the sense of its decisions, we cannot affirm. However, this kind of usurped pre-eminence became so odious to the rest of the Jews, that it did not last long. It began to appear only about the close of the fifth century, and was driven out of the world before the middle of the next, by the Gaonim, or Gaons, a new set of doctors, who took that pompous title upon them, which signifies sublime, or excellent, and who, in the succeeding century, became the idols of the academies, and of the people.

Persecution of the Jews in Persia, under Cavades. They rise against him. Are persecuted under Chosroes. Restored by Hormisdas. Persecuted under Chosroes II. Great numbers slaughtered at Antioch. Conspiracy against the inhabitants of Tyre punished. Chosroes dies of famine. End of the Persian monarchy.

THE sixth century commenced with the persecutions the ten tribes suffered in the east. Cavades, a violent and haughty prince, who could not bear a difference of religions in his kingdom, caused many Christians to be severely tortured. He designed also to force the Iberians to forsake Christianity for the Persian religion; but having first demanded of their king, that their bodies should be left unburied a prey to birds and wild beasts, and the Iberians not being willing to consent to an action so manifestly repugnant to humanity, they put themselves under the protection of the Romans. We must not therefore wonder that this king tormented the Jews of his empire; and it is probably to this that we are to ascribe the frequent alterations that happened in the dignity of the princes of the captivity, for in less than ten years we find four of these princes succeeding one another.

Jews persecuted in Persia, under Cavades

These were Huna, to whom they give but two years reign; Acha, who reigned three; Terana, who reigned four; and Zeutra, who reigned twenty years.

In his time arose the famous Meir, a learned rabbi, and great doctor of law, who having declared war against the Persian king with only four hundred men, was very successful against him during seven years; after which his men having polluted themselves with strange food and female intercourse, he was defeated, taken, and put to death by the Persians. They went thence into the city where Zeutra resided, and plundered it. They then took that prince, and the president of the council, and hanged them upon a bridge. His family were forced to betake themselves to flight; and his son and heir, Zeutra II. retired into Judæa, where he became president president of the senate, or Sanhedrim. This the Jewish historians tell us was the source of that series of misfortunes which attended them in Persia, inasmuch that their great master Hahonai never dared to shew his face during the space of thirty years, that is, during the whole time of the reign of Cavades.

The Jews
persecuted
under Chosroes.

Chosroes the Great was not more favourable to them than his father. They had endeavoured to purchase his favour by betraying the emperor Justinian. This prince had sent ambassadors to the east to negotiate a peace, and had loaded them with presents, which were received with such acknowledgments, that there was reason to hope for a speedy issue of the treaty, when the Jews, who had their spies and deputies at this court, insinuated to Chosroes, that if he was willing to continue the war, they would furnish him with fifty thousand men in Judæa, by which means he might take Jerusalem, one of the richest cities in the world. Chosroes accepted the proposal, broke off the negotiation with the emperor, and was preparing to second the endeavours of the traitors, when news was brought that the deputies, who were departed to execute the design, had been seized upon their return, and sentenced to death, having first confessed their crime.

This desire to oblige the Persian prince did not engage him in their interests; and they not only had their share in the general miseries of the empire, when Chosroes, who often took arms against the Romans, pillaged Syria, and advanced to Judæa, to make himself master of Jerusalem, but this prince also shut up all the academies of the east, which obstructed the progress of the sciences. We do not so much as find that there was then a prince of the captivity, since Zeutra II. had been obliged to retire to Judæa, where he long exercised an office infinitely beneath that he would have possessed at Babylon, if he had been suffered there.

Restored
by Hormis-
das.

Hormisdas III. restored them their liberty; for the academy of Pundebita was opened. R. Chanon Mehischka began to teach: but this unhappy prince reigned not long: his rebellious subjects took him prisoner; and his own son, Chosroes II. deprived him of his life.

This young prince did not peaceably enjoy the fruits of his parricide; for Varanes, who had been his father's enemy, declaring himself also his, and pretending to ascend the throne, expelled him Persia, having first beat his army. He was obliged to engage in many battles, before he could get the mastery of Varanes, who had made a considerable party in the state, and defended himself with great bravery. The Jews were in his interest. "This faithless, restless, imperious, jealous, envious, implacable nation (says the Greek historian) was then so powerful in Persia, as to raise the people against their prince, and to fortify the rebels; because it was extremely multiplied, and had amassed prodigious wealth." Chosroes, getting the mastery, expiated this treachery with their blood. Those of Antioch fell first into the hands of Mebodus, the Roman general. This was not the Syrian city, but another, which Chosroes I. had built in Persia, and had given it that name, because he had formed it by the other's model, and had transplanted its inhabitants. It is said they were amazed, when they entered it, to find their country again; a second Antioch; the same streets and houses they had left. Mebodus, having taken this place, put numbers of Jews to the sword, destroyed others by different punishments, and reduced the rest to a miserable slavery.

Persecuted
by Chos-
roes II.

Slaughtered at

However, Chosroes being resettled, was reconciled to them, and usefully employed them in his designs. Indeed, this prince, who delighted in war, gave out, that he armed to revenge the death of Mauritius, his benefactor, upon Phocas, who had killed him, and made himself master of the empire. Chosroes broke into Syria and Judæa, where he did terrible execution. He returned again in Heraclius's time, took Jerusalem, and carried with him a cross which a Jew had found. It is most probable this nation had correspondence with Chosroes, since, upon his being master of Jerusalem, he returned them all the Christian prisoners, which they only bought to satiate their implacable malice; for ninety thousand persons were unmercifully butchered.

Elmacinus, and other Arabian historians, add, that Chosroes going to besiege Constantinople, there was a necessity of evacuating all the places of Syria, and drawing out all the garrisons, to come to the assistance of the capital; and the Jews, seizing this opportunity, conspired with all their nation in Judæa, to murder, on an Easter-day, all the inhabitants of the city of Tyre, and make themselves masters of that important post. All the conspirators came secretly to the walls; but finding greater resistance than they expected, they spread themselves in the country, where they burnt the Christian churches. The Tyrians, who beheld this spectacle from the ramparts and towers, struck off a Jew's head upon every church that fell, or was burning; and as they killed two thousand Jews, they must have burnt two thousand churches. The citizens going out, found this company dispersed like a flock of sheep in the field, and made great slaughter of them. It is no wonder that Chosroes then favoured the eastern Jews, since they made such advantageous divisions on his account.

Historians relate, that Chosroes continued always devoted to judicial astrology; that entering, one day, the church of Dora whilst the service was performing, the Christians were disturbed, as if their mysteries had been profaned, and their religion dishonoured, by the presence of this heathen prince. Domitian, bishop of Melitene, not being able to bear the affront he offered the church, went out, and threatened to bring his troops. Chosroes sent his apology to the prelate, who received it, returned, censured the prince, and drove him out of the church.

This prince was imprisoned by his subjects and his son, and they gave him gold and silver instead of bread, saying, "Enjoy, at thy pleasure, all the things thou hast desired with an insatiable thirst." He died of famine, in the midst of his treasure, in the year 628; and three years after concluded the Persian monarchy, which went to the Saracens; Isdigerdes, the last of their kings, having been conquered near Cadesia.

CHAP. XIII.

Conquests of Omar, successor to Mahomet. Taking of Jerusalem. Fall of the Persian monarchy. Othman elected caliph. His conquests. Is succeeded by Aly. Moavia reigns at Damascus. Isdigerdes persecutes the Jews. Liberality and candour of the Arabians. Aly marries the princess of Persia to the head of the captivity. Academies restored.

THE Arabians made great conquests, and the Jews of the east universally changed masters. Omar, the second caliph, after the death of Mahomet, his predecessor, reigned but ten years and a half, during which he took thirty-six thousand cities or castles, pulled down four thousand temples belonging to the Christians or Magi, built fourteen hundred mosques, and made himself master of all the east.

Notwithstanding all that Heraclius could do to relieve Damascus, which this caliph besieged by his generals, he entered in at the same time by assault and capitulation; for they had forced the intrenchments on one side, whilst they capitulated on the other.

Syria being conquered, by the taking of this place, they prosecuted the siege of Jerusalem, which was already begun, and in a short time totally reduced the place. Omar, walking the streets with an air of devotion, devotion, desired them to shew him Solomon's temple, intending to raise a mosque in the place.

The Arabians assert, that their caliph granted the bishop of Jerusalem a very honourable capitulation for the city; that he entered it without suffering any disorders of his troops; and not allowing any church to be taken from the Christians, very modestly desired of Sophronius a place where he might build a mosque. The bishop shewed him Jacob's stone, and the place where Solomon's temple stood, followed by the principal officers of his army, where, in fine, he built a mosque.

This caliph at the same time attacked the Persians by his generals, and, after many battles, Isdigerdes, the last of the Persian kings, lost Cadesia. His capital, children, and treasures, fell into the enemy's hands. For his own part he fled to Chorazan, where he lay concealed for sixteen years, shifting from place to place, till one of his subjects, the governor of Merou, betrayed him, and invited Tarcan, king of the Turks, to take upon him the government. Isdigerdes gave him battle, lost it; and attempting to pass a river in his flight, the boatman disputed with him about the price of his passage; and whilst they were wrangling, the Turkish horse, who pursued him close, arrived, and took away his life. Thus ended the Persian monarchy; and the Jews, who had been long under its dominion, came under that of the Saracens and Omar, who pushed on his conquests, on the one hand, to the river Oxus, and on the other to Egypt, where he made himself master of Alexandria. Mahomet had educated him; so that two parties appealing from his judgment to that of Omar, when he had heard them, he fetched his sabre, and struck off the head of him that had refused to stand by Mahomet's decision. He took the title of Commander of the Faithful, and observed such great humility in the midst of all his glory, that the governor of Susiana going to wait upon him in a temple, he found him asleep upon the steps among the poor: and it was only to do an honour to his nation before this stranger, that he went and sat in the pulpit of the mosque, which served him for a throne. Renouncing the ties of nature, and the endearments of blood, he declared the caliphship should be elective, and that his son should not have a place in the council, unless he was found worthy to reign. He was killed by a slave as he was at prayer.

After his death the six electors met to nominate a caliph. One of them renounced the election of himself, upon condition he might chuse the caliph alone. The thing was agreed to, and he made choice of Othman, in preference to Aly, the son-in-law of Mahomet, and who was the most eminent for that dignity. He entirely subdued Chorazan, and many provinces of the east; and pushed his conquests as far as Andalous, that is, Andalusia in Spain. In the mean time Aly, who always looked upon him with a jealous eye, raised some Arabians against him. They besieged him in his castle of Medina, where water failing after a three months siege, he came out to the rebels with the Alcoran in his hand, and protested he would have no other judge than that book, which was to be the rule of their conduct. This did not stop the mutineers: they stabbed him in many places, and put an end to his existence.

Aly was elected in his room; and though his passion for the caliphship was violent enough to make him kill his brother-in-law, yet he wanted to be entreated to accept this dignity.

Aischah, Mahomet's widow, rebelled against her son-in-law; and as she had great interest with the Mussulmen, already provoked by the conspiracy against Othman, she was at no trouble to form a numerous army. The battle was fought near Bafora. Aly got the victory, and took Aischah, after a great deal of blood was shed about the camel she rode upon; because brave men had surrounded this woman, and lost their lives in her defence; and for that reason it was called the Battle of Camel. He respectfully sent back his mother-in-law to Mecca; and seeing Arabia and the Babylonian Irach fully subjected to his command, he marched to stifle another rebellion, which was raised against him in Syria.

Moavia headed this revolt, resolving to revenge the death of Othman, his benefactor and relation. This prince prided himself in his humanity and clemency. "The one is brave, and the other courageous," (said he, speaking of his enemies;) but for my own part, I am content to be considered among the Mussulmen as a merciful and gentle prince." It was he that first made a gallery, or a separate place, in the mosque, for the caliph, who was at once the pontiff and sovereign. It was from thence he repeated the office of the Mussulmen, and made them a sort of homily, as the bishop and curate do in the church of Rome. This prince was master of Syria, and made Damascus his capital: he pushed his conquests as far as Constantinople, and besieged it so long, as to sow and reap in the neighbouring fields.

Moavia reigns at Damascus.

Moavia was a formidable enemy for Aly, who, notwithstanding, marched against him, and arrived in a little time upon the frontiers of Syria. Water failing him, he asked for some of a Christian hermit, who had his cell near the camp. The hermit had only three hogsheds of water in his cistern, but told Aly, there was a well in the neighbourhood, shut up with a huge stone, where he might plentifully supply himself. Aly discovered the well, and caused it easily to be uncovered; and having procured a sufficient refreshment, returned thanks to God, and continued his march against Moavia.

The armies were quickly in sight, but not venturing to give a decisive battle, fought in little parties: they reckoned ninety of these skirmishes in an hundred days. Moavia lost forty-five thousand men, but Aly infinitely less. The former perceiving himself too much weakened, fastened many copies of the Alcoran at the end of lances, and causing them to be carried at the head of the army, cried, this was the book that was to decide all differences, and that it was not lawful, without reason, to shed Mussulmens blood. Aly was sensible of the artifice; but his troops being struck with an instinct of devotion for that book, demanded that arbiters should be chosen to terminate the differences betwixt Moavia and Aly.

Aly's umpire was nominated by his generals, who chose a man of great devotion and integrity. Moavia's arbitrator was a man of art. They agreed to depose the two pretenders, and to elect a caliph, who should rule over all the countries which the Mussulmen had conquered. Aly's arbitrator spoke first, and cried, he deposed Aly and Moavia, as he took the ring from his finger. Moavia's arbitrator approved Aly's deposition, and confirmed Moavia in the caliphship, with which he invested him in the same manner, by putting his ring upon his finger. It was in vain to appeal to upright dealing and the agreement, which the last umpire openly violated. They cursed and excommunicated one another. In the mean time Aly, who faithfully observed the suspension of arms, had the mortification to see a great part of his army rebel against him, because he had acknowledged another judge betwixt him and Moavia. He beat the mutineers, and marched a second time against Moavia, with different success. Here he lost Abdalla, one of his best generals: he had also the misfortune to hear that his own brother had deserted him, and sided with his enemies. At last three resolute men, enraged to see so much bloodshed, resolved to slay the heads of a faction who caused so great a division between the Mussulmen. Aly was killed in the mosque by one of these assassins, and Moavia was only wounded. Hassan, Aly's son, was forced to yield the caliphship to Moavia, who remained master of Syria and Egypt. He was the chief founder of the race of the Omniades, which was always an enemy to that of Aly.

Jesid, his son and successor, was cruel and impious; and therefore the Persians never speak of him without without execration. However, he was acknowledged caliph in Persia, and in all the lands of the Mussulmen, except Mecca, Medina, and some cities of Chaldea.

Moavia II. succeeded his father; but he was of so weak a constitution, that he voluntarily resigned the caliphship three months after he had accepted it, and went and shut himself up in a chamber, which he seldom or never came out of. Being wiser, or more resigned, than Charles V. he never repented his abdication, and lived happily in his retreat: but the people regretted the loss of him, and caused the man to be buried alive who advised him to quit his dignity. He was so scrupulous as not to charge his conscience with the choice of a successor, because he did not know any one sufficiently accomplished to sustain so heavy a burden. His motto upon his seal was, "The World is nothing but a Cheat."

Marvan was elected, upon condition, That his children should not succeed him, and that the caliphship should return to the house of Moavia. Marvan at first designed to execute his promise; but having humbled all his enemies, he despised Khaled, who was to succeed him, and called him bastard. This young prince's mother, whom Marvan had married, could not bear this insult, but revenged her son, by strangling her husband.

We have related the great revolution by which the Persian monarchy fell; and the dispersed tribes came under the empire of the Mussulmen, who became masters of the east. Let us now see what share they had in these events.

Isdigerdes
the Jews.

Their historians assert, that Isdigerdes, king of Persia, persecuted them some time before the war of the Arabians against him. Their synagogues were given to the Magi; their academies shut up; and the persecution caused the fall of many persons. No wonder then that they rejoiced upon the change of their master. It is an inclination rooted in the heart of the oppressed, to desire, and rejoice at, the humbling of their persecutor. They imagine that God, a just protector of the innocent, punishes the oppressor, and makes him sensible of his iniquity. The Jews passed this judgment upon Isdigerdes and the Persians, who had given them such hard treatment.

They are accused not only of rejoicing at the conquests of the Mussulmen, who destroyed abundance of churches, and did great mischief to the Christians, but of associating with them, of taking their mark, and encouraging them to carry their arms into the empire. But their joy must have often been interrupted by their own misfortunes; for the havoc which the conquerors made in Persia and Syria must have given them disturbance. Besides, it was not necessary that they should provoke the Saracens to war, who were sufficiently inclined to it; and from the moment they had tasted the pleasure of wealth, by plundering some provinces, they forgot their ancient poverty, and thought of nothing but enriching themselves with the spoils of their neighbours. We ought therefore to found the motives of the war, and the invasion of so many kingdoms, on the avarice of the Arabians, and the ambition of their leaders, which was never satiated.

Liberality and candour of the Ara-bians.

The Jews highly extol the humanity of the Arabians, who condemned the violence offered to conscience, and restored them to the free profession of their religion. They lived peaceably under the first caliphs, and their academies were open. Chana taught at Pundebita, under Omar. Mar. Rabba succeeded him; whilst Chenina Surfæus, the son of Calipta, reigned at Sora.

Omar's
equity.

Omar sometimes favoured the Jews: for a Mussulman having gained his cause by Mahomet's decision, and the process being brought before him to be revised, he took his sabre, and cut off the obstinate Mussulman's head, to avenge the Jew of his adversary's cavils. After he was caliph, a Jew complaining to him of a governor of a province, to whom he had delivered some goods which he did not pay for, Omar called for ink, and there being none in the place, he took a brick from the wall of Medina, which he was building, and drew upon it these words: "Put an end to the complaints that are brought against you, or leave your government." The Jew carrying the brick, was presently paid the money. This shews what access this nation had to the caliph, and this prince's love of justice. But yet, if he had equity for private persons, he was very injurious to the nation; for that part which continued in Arabia after Mahomet's conquests he totally expelled.

The Jewish nation, instead of suffering under Jesid, and his first successors, enjoyed a full and absolute peace. Its prince of the captivity reigned with almost as great an authority as if he had been king. The academies had been almost abandoned during the revolution. So great was the desertion of scholars and masters, that they were forced at Sora to make a weaver professor, because he had studied the law. But then they began to relish the sciences again. The profession of physic, which is always profitable, resumed its former lustre. A priest of Alexandria, named Aaron, was at once a physician and teacher: he had published a book, intitled, "The Pandects; or, the Treasure of Remedies." The Jew, Massergieuf, who was at the caliph's court, then translated it into Arabic.

WE shall now turn our attention to the Jews in the west, under the Roman emperors at Constantinople, Africa, Italy, Spain, and France, during the sixth and seventh centuries, which we think expedient to join together, to avoid breaking the chain of their history.

The first cause of complaint which the emperor Justinian gave them, was his edict, which forbade them to celebrate their passover according to their own calculation, and enjoined them to keep it at the same time with the Christians. This was no more than what we are told he did to the latter, whom he obliged to follow his new calculation, which caused no less confusion amongst them; but the Jews, ever tenacious of their old customs, resented it at a higher rate.

They were soon after exposed to a more severe edict, by which that emperor deprived them of several privileges, particularly of making wills, and bequeathing legacies.

He likewise deprived those of Africa of the public exercise of their religion, at the request of the council of Carthage, and sent orders to the prefect of the prætorium to turn all their synagogues into churches, and to restrain them from performing any religious duties in caverns.

This law was executed chiefly at Borium, a city of Africa, situate at the foot of the mountains which bounded Pentapolis on the western-side. The situation of this city was strong, because a chain of mountains shut up its entrance, and left but a very narrow passage to come at it. The Jews had made it it a retreat in Justinian's time. Here they lived the more peaceably, because the emperor demanded no taxes of them, and no imperial collector was ever seen there. They had a stately temple, the foundation whereof they referred to Solomon's time. We are to conclude from this, that they had been a long time settled in this place, and that they were rich, notwithstanding the neighbourhood of the Moors. Justinian undertook the conversion of the inhabitants of this city, as well as of that of Aigula, where heathenism still remained, and where they sacrificed to idols, in temples consecrated to Alexander the Great, and Jupiter Ammon. He succeeded in his design; for the Jews as well as heathens embraced Christianity. The synagogue, or temple of Solomon, became a church: and Justinian caused the city to be walled in, to make it more safe.

These edicts, which were, by the Jews, looked upon as a kind of persecution, failed not, as usual, to produce a more than ordinary discontent, which, by degrees, ripened into a revolt, as soon as a proper opportunity offered.

The first was caused by an impostor, named Julian. He appeared in Palestine, and deluded the people of that country. As he took the title of Conqueror, the easier to surprize his nation, he caused all his credulous followers to arm themselves. The seditious falling unexpectedly upon the Christians, who fancied they had nothing to fear from a nation so often humbled, made great slaughter of them: but Justinian's troops ran to the relief of the oppressed: they soon found they were led by a misguided zeal. Their leader was taken, and punished with death, which terminated the revolt.

There was a second disturbance, twenty-five years after, at Cesarea. The Samaritans and Jews, though mortal enemies to each other, united against the Christians of this city. They demolished the churches, murdered many people, and assassinated the governor in his palace. His wife escaping the danger, carried her complaints to Justinian, who sent speedy orders to Adamantius to bring the cause before him. Informations being laid, and the Jews charged with all the odium and cruelty of this violence, Adamantius confiscated the estates of the rich, put to flight great numbers of the mutineers who had a share in the action, and took off the heads of others. The execution was performed with such severity, that it made all the Jews of that country tremble, and prevented, for a time, their taking up arms against the Christians.

In Italy the Jews declared loudly against Justinian and Belisarius, who besieged Naples. This famous general had recovered Africa to the emperor's obedience; vanquished the Vandals; and, in the triumph decreed him for it at Constantinople, brought out the sacred vessels of the temple of Jerusalem, which Titus had brought to Rome, and Gizeric had carried away when he plundered that great city. This spectacle, which revived the remembrance of the taking of Jerusalem, and the ruin of its temple, must have disturbed the Jews of Constantinople. Upon this sight one of them exclaimed, "that these precious vessels ought not to be brought to Constantinople, nor placed in the emperor's palace. They cannot (said he) be preserved in any other place than that where Solomon consecrated them; and this is the reason that Gizeric has taken Rome, and the Romans have conquered Gizeric."

Belisarius, having conquered the Vandals in Africa, passed over into Italy to fight the Goths, who were masters of the principal places, and first attacked Naples.

There were two factions in this great city, one for the emperor, and the other for the Goths, whom the Jews, who were numerous and considerable there, favoured. The imperialists, to free themselves from the inconveniencies of a siege, had represented to Belisarius, that it was more advantageous to lay siege to Rome; because, if he took that capital, Naples, which continued in subjection to the barbarians but by force, would naturally return to its obedience: but he rejected this proposition, and only made them great promises if they would capitulate. Articles of capitulation were already drawn up, and accepted by Belisarius, who granted all their demands, when the friends of the Goths pathetically addressed the inhabitants, and supported their arguments by the presence of the Jewish merchants, who were there, to assure the people, that they should neither want provisions or ammunition during the siege. The citizens, encouraged by this assurance, took heart, and defended the place for twenty days with the greatest vigour. Belisarius lost many good officers and soldiers in the different assaults in which he was repulsed. The Jews defended that part towards the sea; and as they were persuaded they should have no quarter, since they were the principal cause of the resistance that was made, they fought like desperate men. The city was already taken on another side, whilst they still sustained the enemy's assault in their entrenchments: but at day-light they were forced in them. Belisarius exhorted his army to clemency; but whether he spoke but faintly, or that the soldiers, bent on murder and plunder, were deaf to the general's advice, they respected neither age, sex, or religion, and, without distinction of persons, made a great slaughter. This dreadful severity quelled them for a time; and we hear of neither revolt or persecution during the two subsequent reigns.

Naples besieged and taken.

Though the reign of Mauritius was disturbed with the wars of the Avari, who came from the Danube, and made frequent incursions into Thracia, yet the Jews remained quiet there. This prince's avarice, perhaps, contributed to it; for it was easy to purchase their liberty and peace of him. Besides, the Avari were so remote from Judaea and Syria, that they could not flatter themselves with drawing any hopes of assistance from thence; and perhaps their motions were but little known. But Phocas ascending the throne, by assassinating his mother and his children, it was apprehended this revolution might cause many alterations.

Those of Syria, finding themselves powerful at Antioch, laid hold on the opportunity, and armed against the Christians. The sedition was general, and they fought resolutely on both sides; but the Jews, being the strongest, killed many, and burnt others in their houses, which they had set on fire. The bishop Anastus was treated in a barbarous manner, for they dragged him along the streets, and, after exposing him in the most ignominious manner, threw him into the fire, and burnt him. They were at length, with great difficulty, suppressed by Count Bonosus, whom Phocas sent with a sufficient force against them. Those that came off easiest were banished, and sent away mangled and maimed.

Cruelties of the Jews at Antioch.

The Jews were as numerous and formidable in the isle of Cyprus, where they had found means to establish themselves, notwithstanding the resolution that had been taken in Adrian's reign, of not suffering so much as travellers of that religion there. It was about four years after the massacre at Antioch, that the good Cyprian bishop Leontius, fearing perhaps the same fate from them, resolved, if possible, to convert them to Christianity, and succeeded so well in it, if we may depend upon his apology as genuine, that the far greater part of them were baptized.

The Jews powerful in Cyprus.

Gregory the Great lived at that time: this pontiff was persuaded that the Jews ought to be cultivated, instead of hated, because they were one day to be recalled. Their general conversion was the vehement object of his desires: he prosecuted the means, and wrote to his receiver in Sicily, to abate his farmers, who turned Christians, the third of the revenues they were indebted to him. "They must (said he) be called to the unity of the faith, by mild persuasion, and charitable advice. Violence is likely to disgust those whom gentleness and charity allure. Menaces and terror stop those whom the idea of God's justice, often repeated, has shaken. The true method to convert them

“is not to make them fear us, by carrying severity
“to excess, but to oblige people to come and hear
“the word of God.”

He imagined it lawful to employ money, without believing these presents could infuse faith; for, said he, if we convert not the fathers, we may win the children. The Jews have praised this pontiff, in their annals, for his lenity and indulgence to them; and they had reason; for the abbess of St. Stephen de Gergenti, in Sicily, desiring to signalize her zeal to the pope, gave him notice, that a great number of Sicilian Jews desired to be converted. But he would not be dazzled with a notion of increasing the church. He ordered the abbess not to be too hasty, but to wait till those catechumens were well instructed, before she suffered them to receive baptism.

He had the equity to condemn the extravagant zeal of a new convert of Cagliari. A Jew, who had received baptism the day before, thinking to distinguish himself in his new religion, put himself at the head of a company of young people, and went to the synagogue on Easter-day, and set up crosses there. The chief officers, military and civil, instead of approving this violence, certified against the Jew. The bishop himself, whom he had consulted, denied his consent, and condemned the action. Gregory the Great, desiring to coincide with this prelate in his equitable notions, praised him for not confounding the evil with the good, and advised him to pass censure upon the new convert, without hearkening to the excuses he might make, by laying the fault upon his zeal, and love for religion. He required that the crosses should be removed, and the synagogue left to the Jews; since, though the law forbids them to build new ones, it appoints that they should be left the enjoyment of those they had already. With the same spirit he condemned the bishop of Terracina, who had taken away a synagogue in his diocese, which the laws had established; and had driven the Jews from another place where they had retired for their devotion.

This pontiff not only revived the old edicts issued against their having Christian slaves, which had been long since shamefully neglected, but ordained that all the Jewish domestics who should take refuge in the churches, and be baptized, should become free.

Change of the Jewish affairs under Heraclius.

The condition of the Jews altered much for the worse as soon as the emperor Heraclius had concluded a peace with Persia, by which some relics, formerly taken by them, had been restored to him, and sent to Jerusalem. It plainly appears, from his own words, that he hated the Jewish nation because they were enemies to the Christian religion: but what gave him the first handle against them was his meeting with one at Tiberias, named Benjamin, a man so wealthy as to have alone furnished his army and court with provisions, and so elated on that account, that he harassed the Christians with troublesome law-suits, and malicious prosecutions. Benjamin, fearing his resentment, found no better expedient to avoid it than turning Christian. But this circumstance did not lessen the emperor's aversion to the nation, whom he soon after caused to be banished out of Jerusalem, with a severe prohibition against those who should, from that time, approach within three miles of the city.

He banishes
Jerusalem.

The prediction of some soothsayers, whom he had consulted, gave him greater provocation against the Jews. This restless prince questioned them about the fate of the empire, which was in violent convulsions; and they answered him, “It should be ruined by a circumcised nation.” As he saw the Jews numerous, he gave credit to the soothsayers, and persecuted the Jews, by obliging them to abjure their religion.

Not content with this, the emperor carried his zeal against them into the neighbouring kingdoms, and particularly to Sifibut, king of Spain, who made great numbers prisoner; and, to avoid the most cruel torments, many abandoned their religion.

Isidorus, bishop of Sevil, who was one of Sifibut's admirers in other respects, has yet condemned this prince's zeal, which was without knowledge; and, instead of impressing faith in the hearts of the people, commanded it. Being afterwards at the head of the fourth council of Toledo, he caused a very solemn decree to be made concerning it. This council was assembled by order of Sifimand, who had de-throned Scuintilla, the son of Sifibut, and perceiving the peoples minds divided, because his competitor was still alive, made use of religious means to unite them. He convened the prelates of the kingdom to Toledo, prostrated himself before them, and, in profound humiliation, desired a reformation of discipline. The council furthered the designs of the new king, by giving instructions to the Goths to unite under the same prince for the defence of the nation, and pronouncing anathemas on those who should violate the oath of fidelity they had taken to the usurper. The council declared, that neither Scuintilla, who had abdicated the crown, nor his wife, nor children, nor Gelanus, his brother, who had pretended to take Sifimand's part, and had deceived him, should ever be admitted to the benefit of the church. They went also upon the correction of several abuses, and made regulations about the state of the Jews. It condemned the violence that had been done them by Sifibut's order, declaring, that nobody ought to be forced to believe; that we can only save those that desire it; that, as the first man ruined himself wilfully, by crediting fallacious promises, man cannot be saved but by a free conversion of his mind; and that he ought to be persuaded, and not driven, to the faith.

Decreed
of Toledo.

Chintila, who succeeded Sifimand, and was perhaps his brother, thought also he ought to bring the churchmen into his interest. To this effect he called the fifth council of Toledo, which made many decrees in his favour. But to render his laws more authentic, he caused them to be confirmed by another council, assembled the same year, in the same place. This council did three things against the Jews. 1. It recommended its king, who was inflamed with a persecuting zeal. 2. It solemnly ratified the law that this prince had made to banish all the Jews out of his kingdom. Lastly, it decreed, that no king, for the future, should ascend the throne till he had taken an oath never to violate this law; and anathematized him if he broke it. It is probable this variation of the two councils was caused by the death of Isidorus of Sevil. This prudent and moderate man, whose sentiments were known, presided in the fourth council of Toledo, but he died before the sixth; hence arose the inconsistency of the prelates, who, having lost their truly Christian president, swerved from moderation to violence.

council.

New decrees against
the Jews.

Recefuinthus afterwards called several councils at Toledo, where he offered them a plan of what ought to be the subject of their deliberations. He proposed that they should debate about the election of kings, in which the clergy had great share given them. The Jews were not forgotten, who, after their conversion in former reigns, continued to judaize. The king was weary of this dissimulation, and would have it remedied. However, it seems that this motion of the king, and the decrees of the council, produced a salutary effect: for the principals of the nation met, and wrote to the king, in the name of those of Toledo, and of all Spain, who were in the same circumstances, protesting to him, that, though they had hitherto dissimulated, being neither perfect Christians or perfect Jews, they were resolved to change their conduct, and sincerely embrace the Christian religion. They assured this prince, that they would no longer have any commerce with those of their nation who were unbaptized; that they would not intermarry with them, or observe the sabbath or circumcision. They promised to stone or burn him that should violate this engagement; and if the king would graciously grant them their lives, they would content to be his slaves, and that their goods should be confiscated.

Artificial conduct of the

But their practices soon appeared totally opposite to their professions; for they not only espoused the cause of Judaism, but publicly attacked Christianity, inasmuch that Ervigius was obliged to order Julian, then archbishop of Toledo, to write against them, which he accordingly did, with great force and success, in a learned treatise which he published a little before the close of the seventh century.

Egica complained of a conspiracy the Jews, and their dispersed brethren in Africa, had made against his government. This prince represented to the council assembled at Toledo, that the mischief was spread into all the provinces of the kingdom: that it had not passed the Alps, nor come into France; but that it was nevertheless worthy of consideration; and that it could not be dissembled or tolerated; and therefore demanded not only the council's advice, but assistance. Upon deliberation, it was resolved, that all the Jews should be degraded of their privileges, declared slaves for ever, that their estates should be confiscated, and their children educated by Christians.

France changing its master, the Romans being expelled, and the Visigoths depressed, the Jews laid hold of this revolution to make their way into several places they had not entered before. At least we find, after Clovis, the kings and councils of this kingdom made many regulations relating to their conduct and liberty. They must have been settled at Paris, and the adjacent parts; since Chilbert, to whom this kingdom fell by lot, published an ordinance, forbidding them to appear in the streets from Maunday Thursday till Easter Sunday: because he feared that the people's devotion might cause some insurrection against them; or that they might take advantage of that conjuncture, when the churches were full, and the streets empty, to execute some villainous design. The council of Orleans, held in the year 540, made such another ordinance; which shews that they were dispersed throughout the kingdom.

They were still more numerous and potent in the diocese of Uzes, since Ferreol, the bishop of it, fell under the king's displeasure, and was banished on their account. He thought that he might convert them by living familiarly with them. This familiarity rendered him suspected: it was imagined he engaged in their interests, and probably in their opinions. He was obliged to quit his bishopric, and go to Paris, to justify himself to Chilbert, where he continued many years in exile. But the king being convinced of his innocence, and having restored him to his bishopric, he fell into another extreme, and expelled all the Jews from his diocese.

Avitus, bishop of Clermont, went also to convert the Jews of Auvergne; but the means he employed were not always lawful: on the other hand, the incredulous fell into a criminal violence: for a new convert entering the city with his white habit, upon his receiving baptism, a man of his nation, enraged to see him in that dress, threw upon him a pot of nauseous oil. The people rioting upon that insolence, were going to tear him in pieces, if Avitus had not opposed it: but their revenge was only retarded; for, on Ascension-day, the Christians of Clermont mutinying, quitted the procession to pull down the synagogue. Avitus took occasion to write to the Jews, that he did not approve the violence; but that, as a shepherd, who was to take care of his flock, and seek the straggling sheep, he exhorted them to believe as he did, or leave the city. The threats of the bishop, and the fury of the people, had the effect. The fear of a cruel death enlightened the Jews; and on the third day a part of the people sent their confession of faith to the bishop, desiring to be baptized, which was performed on Whit-Sunday. Those who had resolution to persevere, were banished the city, and obliged to return to Marseilles, from whence they came.

St. Germain, bishop of Paris, was very zealous for their conversion; and the historians of those times relate some instances of his zeal, accompanied with very strange circumstances.

King Chilperic, who found them rich and considerable in his kingdom of Soissons and Paris, also undertook their conversion. Being an abandoned prince, he made it a point to force the Jews, and present them to the font. But this custom was prophaned by these new converts. No great advantage was derived from these designs of Chilperic; indeed, he was actuated by a motive that could not succeed.

Lunel became afterwards one of the most famous academies of the Jews in the west. The youth came to study there from the remotest countries, and found not only doctors that instructed them, but an exemplary charity. Benjamin of Tudela affirms, that the doctors maintained their scholars, and supplied them with cloaths, all the time during their stay in the academy.

After the persecution of the Jews in France, great numbers fled for protection to other countries, where, at the instigation of the Gallic princes, they were most cruelly persecuted. Some were put to death, and others confined in prisons; while great numbers had their heads and beards shaved, and were treated with other marks of infamy, no less obnoxious to the Jews, than degrading to their persecutors.

Avitus treats them with severity.

The king of Cozar's conversion to Judaism. The occasion and manner of it. Chasdai's pains to find out the kingdom of Cozar. His letter to king Joseph. Import of the answer.

Cozar's conversion to Judaism.

THE eighth century is chiefly celebrated for the conversion of Cozar, king of an heathen nation, and is one of the most considerable events of the Jewish history. Cozar was a serious, thoughtful prince, who, after examining all religions, and holding conferences with Philosophers, Christians, Mahometans, and Jews, determined in favour of that of Moses.

The occasion
manner of it

His conversion was effected by the observations and reasonings of a famous rabbi, named Sangari, who explained several learned matters to him much to his satisfaction. The king, however, fearful of alarming his idolatrous subjects, and thereby instigating them to a revolt, communicated the secret only to the general of his army, and departing privately with him, they arrived at a certain mountainous desert near the sea, where the night surprising, and obliging them to enter a cave, they found there the Jews keeping their sabbath. The prince and general, overjoyed at this adventure, made their abjuration to these Jews, and being circumcised, resumed their way back to the capital. In the mean time, the noise of the king's conversion being spread abroad, those who had hitherto dissembled their Judaism, openly professed it, and converted the Cozareans. Rabbins and doctors were sent for from several places to instruct the new converts, and convert the rest; so that above an hundred thousand embraced this religion. A tabernacle was built after the model of that which Moses set up in the wilderness. The original Jews were exceedingly honoured; and the king himself resolved to have a preceptor of that nation, to remove his remaining doubts, and to open to him all the precepts of the law. He had most inclination for the Caraites, who are scrupulously addicted to the law, and more zealous than the traditionists; but he yielded to the reasons of Sangari, who was a Thalmudist. The king grew happy and potent: he triumphed over his enemies, and made new conquests, which rendered him strong and formidable to his neighbours.

Judaism must have continued long in this kingdom, since, more than two hundred and fifty years after, king Joseph gave an account of his faith to a Spanish rabbi, who desired to be informed of his state, and method of governing his people. The doctor's name was Chasdai, who, according to the most most authentic accounts that can be produced, lived in the tenth century.

Chasldai was treasurer-general to Abderanus, and had so great an authority at this prince's court, that nothing was done without his advice. He confesses he had often heard mention of the kingdom of Cozar, without being able to discover it, till the ambassadors from Constantinople informed him, that merchants frequently came from this country, whose commodities were skins, and who told him that the reigning king's name was Joseph. He resolved to write to this prince, and be at the charge of sending an express with his letter. He took the opportunity of the ambassadors return to Constantinople to conduct him so far. The envoy resided there for six months, after which he was obliged to return the same way he came, upon information that the roads to Cozar were impassable. Chasldai, much chagrined at this disappointment, designed to send his letter to Jerusalem, that it might be carried to Nisibe, thence to Armenia, and from Armenia to the country of Baradas, and the kingdom of Cozar. But two ambassadors of the king of Gablim arriving at Cordua, undertook to make a more certain and speedy expedition. He was also informed, that there was an old blind man in Spain, who had been a favourite of the king of Cozar; but, upon search after him, he was not to be found, which obliged him to commit his letter to the Gablim ambassadors, who caused it to be delivered to king Joseph.

He was desired to give a description of his kingdom, the number of his provinces and cities, what people he made war upon; whether there were any adjacent isles, whether any of these islanders turned Jews, and the names of the kings his predecessors. He was asked too, whether war expelled the sabbath? i. e. Whether it was allowed to defend themselves, and attack the enemy on the sabbath-day.

That prince, at his request, gave him an account of his kingdom, government, and religion, which, if genuine, would prove, at least, that the Jewish religion was not only established in that kingdom under one of his predecessors, whom he names Bula, but likewise prove that it still continued to flourish in his dominions; though there is very little in the description of them, of their situation, limits, climate, cities, rivers, and products, that can direct a reader where to find them; so that we deem it needless to dwell longer on that legend.

CH A P. II.

Jews under the caliphs. Christians persecuted in Egypt. Caliphship translated to the house Abbassides. They are favourable to the Jews. Law of Giasar the Just. Character of Mohadi, successor of Almanzor. Charlemagne's embassy to him. Motassem governs with justice. Fathek oppresses the Jews. Likewise his successor Motarakel. Divisions among the learned. Revolution in the house of the caliphs.

ABDALMELEC held the caliphship in the beginning of the eighth century. His avarice was so exorbitant that nothing could content it; and he was so violent an enemy to the house of Aly, as not to bear even to be commended by a poet of that sect. He pushed his conquests as far as Spain, and triumphed wherever he carried his arms. In the height of his victories he preserved a great moderation: he neither persecuted the Jews or Christians of his dominions; but allowed the former their academies and privileges; and would not take from the latter, by force, one of their churches at Damascus, which they had refused him, but left them in the peaceable enjoyment of it.

Valid, the eldest of sixteen sons, succeeded his father; and though he reigned but nine years, yet he conquered many provinces in Spain and Sardinia. The islands Majorca and Minorca were reduced to his obedience; and his troops penetrated even into the Narbonnese Gaul. He was a bigot to his law, and so had no kindness for the Christians. He erected a mosque at Damascus upon the ruins of a church, and built another at Jerusalem. Soliman, that is Salomon, his brother, succeeded him, but continued not long in his sovereignty. He was obliged to fortify Rama, in Palestine, to stop the incursions the Arabians made into the Holy Land. Omar II. Abdalafi's son, was his successor, at whose death the caliphship returned into the family of Abdalmelec, and was possessed by his third son, called Jolid II. He made himself famous by his conquests, it being in his reign that the Saracens besieged Tolouse and Narbonne. The Christians of Egypt suffered so much in his reign, that the king of Nubia, which lies betwixt Thebais and Æthiopia, came to their succour with an hundred thousand men, and would not return till Hascem sent the patriarch of Alexandria to assure him he would not disturb the church. It is probable the Jews had an hand in these violent proceedings, since they were caused by the avarice of the Egyptian governors.

Christians persecuted in Egypt.

The house of the Omniades ended a little after under Marvan. The Abbassides had already, for some time, meditated a rebellion in Chorazan; the governor whereof wrote a letter to his master in these words; "I see through the ashes the light of some coals which will break out to your confusion: fire is kindled with wood, and war by discourse. I would know whether Omni wakes or sleeps?" He answered but this, "The present see more than the absent: cut off the mischief before it spreads farther." But as he studied not how to remedy the disease, the Abbassides, as being descendants of Hascem, broke out into a rebellion in the reign of Marvan. This prince was brave and unfortunate. Ab or Abbas Saffa, whom Elmacin calls Abulgebatus, revolting against him, and being proclaimed caliph, the war proved cruel and fatal to Marvan by a particular accident. This prince, having drawn his army in battle array, went aside upon a particular occasion. His horse, that he had left, took the bit in his teeth, and running to the army, threw them into a panic, as believing the caliph was killed; so that, without any further information, they took to flight. Marvan made fruitless attempts to rally his frightened troops, and was forced to fly with them to Damascus, from whence, not thinking himself secure, he passed into Egypt, where giving battle again, he lost his life; and his head was carried to his enemy, who remained master of the caliphship. He used his advantages so outrageously, that he was siled Saffa the Bloodshedder; because, besides those who were killed in the battles, he put all the house of Omniades to the sword, except one man, who fortunately escaped, passed into Spain, and reigned there. Abdalla, the new caliph's uncle and general, having gathered together fourscore princes of the family of the Omniades, caused them all to be knocked on the head with massy wooden clubs; and having their bodies laid on a table covered with tapeltry, gave to all his officers a dinner of a new invention; and the entertainment was carried on among the sighs and groans of expiring men. Afterwards he caused the sepulchres of this family to be opened, and taking out the dead bodies, hung them upon gibbets. Thus perished that house which had produced fourteen caliphs. That of the Abbassides succeeded, and reigned above five hundred years. As the former caliphs had their seat at Damascus, these chose the city Coufa for their capital, situate upon the banks of the Euphrates, four days journey from Bagdad. This city is decayed long since, and considerable for nothing but the sepulchre of Aly, which is in its neighbourhood, and visited by his followers with great devotion. The Abbassides, when they changed the seat of their empire, brought their capital nearer the habitation of the Jews, who had still their academies on the banks of the Euphrates. Almanzor, who succeeded his brother, built also Bagdad, for greater security. He called it the city of Peace; but it retains the name of the hermit Bagdad, who had his cell in the meadows where the city was built. And it was in the neighbourhood of the Tigris and Euphrates that the caliphs resided after that time.

They are favourable to the Jews.

The Abbassides treated the Jews favourably: In fact this nation having suffered what was unavoidable, and common to all subjects in the revolutions of an empire, resumed their first tranquillity under Almanfor, who was a man of letters, and drew to his court all the learned of his time, without troubling himself about the difference of religions. His first physician was a Christian. Almanfor, who loved him, was willing to make him a Turk; but he answered, that he would either be burnt, or saved with his ancestors. The prince smiled at the answer, and dismissed him to die in peace at home. Almanfor, who delighted in astronomy, had also some men from Persia well versed in that science. He had especially Jews in his attendance, who took advantage of that circumstance to bring their academies into new repute. R. Joseph and Samuel presided in the university of Pundebita. Doræus, Ananias, and Maltha, succeeded them. There were likewise two famous men at the head of the academy of Sora, who went both by the name of Judah; one was the son of Nachman, and the other of Outhrineus. His book, called the Great Lessons, was received with so general an applause, that Judah, who taught at Sora, soon after made an abstract of it. This Judah was blind. However, he had the title given him of the Great Light, because the Jews, thinking it an affront to their learned men to call them blind, concealed that imperfection under an honourable title. There was another doctor in the same century, called R. Mari, whom they also stiled Light of the Eyes, from his great knowledge and penetration. Acha was another doctor profoundly skilled in the precepts of the law; upon which he composed a large volume, intitled Schealtot; but as he clashed with the head of the captivity, he could not arrive to the quality of sublime doctor or excellent, which mortification was attended by another. Samuel, the head of the captivity, when he died, named another prince to succeed him; but so far from having any regard to the reputation and learning of this doctor, he chose his servant to preside over the nation. Acha could not digest this last affront, so that leaving the academy, he went into Judæa, whilst his servant Nithroneus possessed the principality, which he enjoyed for thirteen years. Ananus had the same misfortune as Acha. This rabbin was a man of parts, but could not be admitted to the number of doctors, because his doctrine was suspected of some blemish. This suspicion was well-grounded, for he put himself at the head of the Sadducees, which sect was believed to be almost buried in the ruins of Jerusalem. They recovered strength, and, under the conduct of this famous leader, became formidable to their enemies. Some consider this Ananus as the father of the Caraites, rather than the restorer of Sadduceism. But we have shewn that the Caraites could not claim him for their founder, because they were of a more ancient standing.

Giafar, surnamed the Just, (Sadek,) who lived at that time, heavily afflicted the Jews of Arabia, and also of Persia. He was the sixth of the Imams; so the Mussulmen stiled their supreme pontiff, who presides over the mosques. He has a temporal as well as spiritual authority. Such as cast off their subjection to him are looked upon as atheists. The Persians have a particular reverence for twelve of these Imams, the immediate successors of Aly, among whom Giafar is one of the most considerable. This Imam made an order, that the Jews and Christians who turned Mussulmen should be sole heirs of their family; and as this law was precisely executed, it caused many to apostatise, who by this means succeeded to the estates which they could not obtain in a lawful way.

Almanfor, having reigned two and twenty years, departed this life. Abdalla, his uncle, had disputed the caliphship with him, which he pretended to be due to his valour, and the services he had done to Saffa. But being overcome, he was shut up in a house supported by stones of rock salt; and Almanfor, by conveying a water-stream under the palace, dissolved these stones, threw down the building, and buried Abdalla in the ruins. The rest of his reign would have been very happy, had he not disgraced it by his avarice. Finding his death approaching, he sent for Mohadi, his son and heir, whom he commanded to honour his relations, because the honour he did them reflected upon himself; and to treat his freemen kindly, because they were persons who would serve him in time of need. He forbade him to build the city Bagdad on the east side, and to admit women into affairs of state; after which he recommended him to Providence, and expired. Historians give quite a different character of this prince. He was as liberal as his father was covetous. He spent six millions of gold crowns in one pilgrimage to Mecca, having conveyed thither snow and ice, which strangely surprized the inhabitants, who had never seen any before. He held his court of justice, attended by the most able Mussulmen, and discountenanced the unjust judges. Lastly, he obliged the empress Irene to pay him a tribute of seventy thousand gold crowns, to be freed from the incursions of the Arabians, who incommoded her as far as Constantinople. He was an enemy to the Jews, and would either have them embrace his religion, or wear a badge to distinguish them from the Mussulmen; and he sent Thebias, one of his generals, to Emesa with this commission, which he executed with great severity.

Aaron, surnamed the Just, succeeded to the caliphship, after the death of his brother, in the year 786, and was one of the greatest of the Arabian princes. He loved men of letters; but, instead of affording them implicit belief, exactly weighed whether their decisions comported with the good of the state: "You are more learned than I," (said he, once, to one of his casuists, who would have put him upon a false step, upon pretence of observing the Mussulman law,) "but I have more prudence and understanding than you."

Charlemagne thought it expedient to make an alliance with this prince: he believed it might be of use to him to make a diversion in the empire of the east, that none might presume to dispute with him the conquests he made in the west. He had, perhaps, more extensive views, to which the caliph's assistance was absolutely necessary.

In order to render his embassy more acceptable, he made choice of Isaac, a Jew, whom he sent to Persia, with the counts Lancrede and Sigismund. Isaac was thought a proper man to negotiate with a prince, who had great commerce with his nation, dispersed in his dominions, and who hated the Christians. He best knew the stile and manner of the orientals, by means of his dispersed brethren, who were in credit at Aaron's court. The eastern Jews, upon the whole, enjoyed a profound tranquillity in his reign, and made their synagogues and academies flourish.

Aaron was succeeded by his son Amin, about the beginning of the ninth century; but he proved so weak a prince, and so addicted to his pleasures, that his brother Mamoun found an opportunity to dethrone him.

He was a prince eminent for his noble actions, a lover of learning, and endeavoured to bring it into the esteem of the Arabians, who had neglected it till that time; and, in order to succeed in it, caused all the good books of the Jews to be translated into that language.

This step was not at all relished by his subjects, who were ready to revolt; but that consideration did not prevent him from distinguishing learned men of all nations, among whom was a celebrated Jewish astronomer, who had been in high repute ever since the reign of Almanfor, but was now esteemed at this court as the phoenix of his age. He was therefore highly esteemed by Mamoun, during whose reign the Jewish academies of Sora and Pundebita abounded with men of letters.

Mamoun, at his death, preferred his brother Motasssem before his own son Abbas; who, at the instigation gation of some lords, had at first a design to assume the caliphship, but afterwards yielding to his uncle's remonstrances, not only took an oath of fidelity, but obliged all his party to do the same. As Christian princes call themselves kings, by the Grace of God, he would be called Motasssem Billah, that is, a prince, preserved by the Grace of God. Disgusted with Bagdad, by the frequent seditions of its inhabitants, he drew nearer to Syria, where he built Samarah, or Sermeurai, which became the capital of these caliphs. He governed his dominions with great justice, and won a battle against the emperor Theophilus, which cost the Christians above thirty thousand men.

Vathek op-
presses the Jews.

Vathek, his successor, became a bitter enemy to the Jews, upon two accounts. 1. Because they had been guilty of great frauds in the management of the finances, which had been committed to their care in the reign of his predecessor. 2. Because they would not receive the Alcoran, for which refusal they were heavily taxed, and forced to pay very large fines into his treasury.

This prince was a lover of learned men, and particularly of astronomers, who deluded him concerning the duration of his life: and he was so charitable, that no beggar was seen in his capital, nor in the rest of his dominions, during his reign.

Motarakel met with opposition upon his claim of the caliphship, after the death of his brother; for there was a design to set the son of Vathek on the throne: but it being represented that it would be a disgrace to the Mussulmen to have a person at the head of them unqualified to say the public prayers, Motarakel was appointed successor. He rigorously treated the followers of Aly, and forbade the pilgrimages that were made to his tomb.

He does his duty for Motarakel.

He declared himself likewise against the Jews: for he ordered that all who were in his empire should wear a leathern girdle as a mark of distinction. He excluded them from all offices of the divan and the government, which is an argument that they were admitted in it till that time. He forbade them having iron stirrups to their saddles, and to ride upon horses, permitting them only the use of asses and mules. This prince not only degraded them from all the honours they had enjoyed, but stigmatized them with marks of distinction and infamy; and what was of worse consequence to them, Motarakel's law spread itself not only through his empire, but into the neighbouring dominions. In fine, it has more or less subsisted; for it is observed at this day in many places where the Turks command.

Dispute
among the
Jews.

The Jews had another misfortune in this caliph's reign. Faction was re-kindled in one of their academies. Menachem, the son of Joseph, was sole president at Pundebita, when the people went about to give him a partner, called Mattathias. He could not bear this competitor. Each made their party. The disputes were violent; but at last Menachem carried it. He died two years after, and left the place and authority to Mattathias, who enjoyed it a much longer time.

Motarakel was slain by his son. This cruel prince had an iron stove, pointed within, which he caused to be heated in proportion to the punishment he designed for the offender; and when the sufferer cried, "Have pity on me," he answered, "Pity is a meanness of soul." His vizier died in this stove after forty days torture. He spared not his own son Moutassar, who, tired with these hardships, caused him to be slain. He was not long a gainer by his parricide. Being tormented with cutting remorse, he thought he saw his father reproaching him with his crime. His brother Mothas was as unfortunate as he; for the Turks and Egyptians which he had in pay, revolting against him, entered into his palace, dragged him from his throne by the feet, exposed him to the sun, and beat him with their battle-axes till he had signed his deposition. They contrived his death soon after, either by debarring him of drink, or by giving him poison with water and ice. Mothadi, who succeeded him, was quickly deposed by Mothamed, a weak man, addicted to his pleasures, who was absolutely governed by his brother and nephew. It was in his reign that Egypt was dismembered from the caliphship. Akmed refusing to depend upon him, was declared a rebel, and ordered to be execrated in all the mosques of the empire. But this hindered not a new dynasty being set up in Egypt, and the beginning of a succession of new caliphs.

CHAP. III.

Violent effects of a dispute concerning images. Jews oppressed in Syria. Favoured under Nicephorus and Michael. Revolution in Spain. Juda a learned Jew. The Saracens, abetted by the Jews, are victorious. Jews flourish under Lewis the Debonnair. Disturbed by the bishop of Lyons. That prelate's untimely zeal suppressed. State of the Jews under Charles the Bald. They are accused of assisting the Normans. Obnoxious to particular cities.

THE question about images occasioned violent commotions in the empire. Not only the divines engaged in it, the church divided, councils were called, and passed contrary decisions, but persecutions also broke out, the people revolted and flew to arms, and the controversy drew after it torrents of blood.

The Jews were accused of having had a considerable hand in it, if they were not the first movers of it. However that may be, it is plain that the new emperor declared himself no less zealous against the Jews than against images; for both they and the Montagnards, or Manichees, were commanded by him to turn Christians, under the severest penalties; only the latter being more tenacious of their principles, suffered themselves to be burnt for them; while the Jews took their old method of dissimulation to save their lives. But as the patrons for images gained their point, notwithstanding the strenuous opposition of the emperor and his followers, they obliged the Jews, on whose sincerity they had no great reason to rely, to subscribe to a formulary, acknowledging themselves worshippers of holy images, and imprecating Divine vengeance if they were not sincere in their profession.

Violent effects of a dispute concerning
images.

The Jews found themselves involved in the desolations of Jerusalem and Syria. Abdalla, the son of Aly, traversing Judea, commanded the Christians to shave their beards, and wear long caps. Arriving at Jerusalem, he would have all the Jews, as well as Christians, to be marked in the hand, to distinguish them from Mussulmen. Most of the Christians so marked, being unable to bear this disgrace, or else fearing a more violent persecution, withdrew themselves to the territories of the Roman empire. But the Jews, who were as much afraid of Leo Isauricus as of the caliphs, continued in the lands subject to their obedience. It is even said that they entered into Abdalla's train, that they might enrich themselves with the spoils of the Christians. Indeed, this general had always a considerable number of them in his army, to whom he sold the church-plate and furniture he had plundered.

The Jews
are oppressed in Syria.

They fared much better under Nicephorus, who succeeded Leo Isauricus, about the beginning of the ninth century, and declared against images; for which reason it probably was that the other side loaded him with invectives, as having put himself under the guidance and direction of the Manichees and Attingans, a kind of diviners or soothsayers, to whom they attributed surprising power and influence, with respect to the success of princes, and the state of kingdoms. Nicephorus, however, protected the Jewish nation, and suffered them to live unmolested during his reign.

Favoured
under Ni-cephorus and Michael.

Michael, surnamed the Stammerer, was still more favourable to them than Nicephorus. It is even said, said, that he was half a Jew. This prince came from Amorium, a city of Phrygia, in which a great variety of sectaries had taken sanctuary. It is pretended that Michael borrowed something from all these sects, which he had known and studied in his youth; that he had taken baptism from the Christians, which he substituted in the room of circumcision; but otherwise he generally observed all the Jewish ceremonies.

The state of the Jews in Italy, at this time, cannot be ascertained; and Spain furnishes but a very slender account. The Saracens had entered and reduced it to their obedience. Moses, or Musa, the governor of Africa, upon the invitation of the Christians, sent one of his generals, named Tarck, into Spain, who, making his descent at the foot of the mountain Caspe, gave it its name; hence it is called Gibal Tar at this day; or, The mountain of Tarck. Roderick lost his life, and crown that was given him in the year 712. Moses, taking that advantage, passed his army into Spain, and pushed his conquests not only to Toledo, but beyond Saragossa. But as he depended upon Olic, the caliph of Damascus, he was recalled some time after.

Revolutions
in Spain.

A Jew was resolved to take advantage of this revolution, and of the wars the new governors made with the French in Languedoc: he was called Serenus, and pretended to a divine mission. He found in Spain abundance of people disposed to believe and follow him into the Holy Land, where he was to establish his empire. Ambisa, who was then governor, took advantage of this desertion, and seized all the estates they had vacated by their credulity. It is not said how far Serenus carried these credulous people; but it is most probable that some died by the way, and that the rest returned into their country, to bewail the loss of their estates, which they had so imprudently quitted.

The house of the Omniades, which enjoyed the caliphship in the east, sent governors and troops hither to confirm their ancient conquests, and to make new ones. This family was ruined by that of the Abbassides, which made a general massacre of all that belonged to it. Abdalrahman, whom we call Abderame, must not be confounded with a general of the same name, who was defeated by Charles Martel, and had the good fortune to escape into Spain with his father. Moavius acknowledged him caliph in all the west. He reigned there a long time, and began to build the famous mosque of Cordua, which his son finished by the help of the Christians, whom he ordered from Narbonne Gaul, to work upon the sumptuous temple of his prophet. In the reign of this caliph appeared R. Juda, who distinguished himself in his nation by his learning. As he had studied philosophy, he investigated the causes that hindered the sea from overflowing the land, and published a treatise on it, which got him great reputation. He published also an Arabian dictionary, and translated many books of that language into Hebrew; which shews not only that this man was learned, and that the sciences flourished then in the Spanish synagogues, but also that these first caliphs were more favourable to them than to the Christians, who were forced to labour upon the building of a mosque, after having taken the materials from them.

a learned
Jew.

As Languedoc was added to Spain ever since the Visigoths were masters of it, that province was the first exposed to the incursions of the Arabians, who had defeated the Visigoths. In the first years of their conquests they made themselves masters of Narbonne, and came and besieged Tolouse. It is asserted that the Jews, who had made a particular treaty with them, assisted them, upon condition that all the Christians should be murdered that were in the town after it was taken. It is also said that the Jews of Tolouse, weary of the tyranny of the present bishop, called in the Saracens from Spain, and promised to deliver up the city, upon condition that, having massacred all the Christians upon their entrance, the traitors should be permitted to enjoy several privileges, and an entire liberty. The Sara-cens took Narbonne in their march, and advanced as far as Lyons, destroying all that fell into their hands. Vaifier, duke of Aquitaine, vainly endeavoured to oppose their passage; he was defeated, and lost his life. After his death, the victor besieged Tolouse, took it, and put all the inhabitants to the sword, except the Jews, to whom he religiously performed the promise he had made them. But Charlemagne having won three battles over Abderame, and retaken the city of Tolouse, was resolved to punish the traitors for their baseness, and all the blood they had caused to be spilt. They were condemned to death, and the instruments of their punishment were already prepared, when the cries and groans of so many poor wretches moved Charlemagne, and obliged him to mitigate the punishment. Instead of a general execution, he was contented with the heads of the principals in the treason; and ordered, for the future, that all the Jews living at Tolouse should receive a box on the ear thrice a year at the gate of a church, that should be appointed by the bishop, and pay a perpetual fine of thirteen pounds of wax.

The Saracens, abetted by the Jews, are victorious.

They were still more favoured under Lewis, surnamed the Debonnair, whose chief physician was a Jew, whom some historians have represented as one of the greatest magicians in the world. He was in such high credit with that prince, that all the courtiers were glad to gain his and his countrymen's friendship with the most sumptuous presents. The emperor gave them liberty to build new synagogues, and granted them very advantageous edicts. So powerful a protection bred jealousy and great disorders in the diocese of Lyons.

Jews flourish under Lewis the Debonnair.

Agobard, who was bishop of it, had forbidden his flock to sell Christian slaves to the Jews to be carried into Spain, and to keep the sabbath. It cannot be doubted but this prelate had a power to make such laws as these for the government of the people committed to his care, and then did what is usual with able men when invested with authority. He forbade the Christians to buy wine of the Jews, and to eat with them during Lent. The Jews complained of these laws to Lewis, who being provoked against Agobard, and the citizens of Lyons, sent three commissaries to take information. The bishop was much surprized to see them arrive at his house. Some inhabitants, who probably were guilty of more capital oppressions, betook themselves to flight. The bishop, having more authority, waited the consequences of the inquest, which was not to his advantage, since the Jews were restored to the possession of their privileges, and the market on Saturday was changed to another day of the week, that the necessity of trading that day might not oblige them to violate their sabbath. The emperor had in his turn the power of making regulations relating to the police. In the mean time Agobard was much disgusted: he questioned whether these were the true orders of the emperor; though he could not doubt it, since his seal was put to them. He accused his ministers of corruption: he charged the Jews with stealing frequently Christian children, in order to sell them, and of doing the basest actions, and related this upon the declaration of a fugitive of Corduba, who said, that they had sold him in his youth.

Disturbed by the bishop of Lyons.

These accusations were not believed at court, and his remonstrances had no effect. Evrard, the emperor's commissary, continued to protect the Jews, and to mortify the archbishop of Lyons, who omitted nothing in support of what he had done. He wrote a second time to the emperor, and sent him a treatise on the Jewish superstitions, signed by two bishops he had joined with him, to give greater weight and authority to his book. He endeavoured to prove in this piece, that we ought to have no commerce with heretics, and particularly with the Jews, because there is no sectary but what has some article of faith in common with the church.

All these effects failing, Agobard made a journey to court, to solicit more effectually against the Jews, whom he looked upon as personal enemies. He had audience of the emperor, but it was only an audience audience of leave; being permitted to return to his diocese without giving him any satisfaction. The disappointment of this journey redoubled his grief. He was afraid of provoking the court, by baptizing of heathens who were in the service of the Jews, and sometimes took refuge in the churches to turn Christians. Therefore, as he durst not venture upon this last stage without the emperor's leave, he sent to beg his permission. What answer he had we cannot learn; but we have reason to conclude, from a most uncharitable and splenetic epistle he wrote to the great and learned Nebutius, bishop of Narbonne, that it was not acceptable.

The protection the Jews found at Lewis's court, against one of the most learned bishops of his age, made them flourish in France. It was said openly at court, that the posterity of Abraham and the patriarchs ought to be respected. Even some Christians began to conform to the Jewish rites in many instances that were a reproach to their profession.

The state of the Jews was not so entirely agreeable under Charles, surnamed the Bald, when Remisius, a prelate of eminence, caused some of his clergy to preach in their synagogues; by which means so great a number of their children were like to have been converted, that they were forced to send them away to Vienne in Dauphine, Macon and Arles in Provence, and other places, where they were more numerous. The bishop sent a complaint to court, and begged of that prince to send orders to the bishop of Arles, &c. to follow his method, representing that the conversion of those children was a greater act of charity than saving them out of the lion's mouth. In all probability Charles consented to this request, for numbers of Jewish children were baptized, all by their own free choice; and the emperor was soon after poisoned by Sedecias, his Jewish physician, lately mentioned, who is supposed to have been suborned to that vile deed by those of his own nation.

They are likewise accused of having a great hand in the troubles that happened under this reign, by the incursion of the Normans into several provinces, particularly that of Aquitaine, where they were very numerous. They were still liable to the ignominious sentence passed against them by Charlemagne, of being buffeted three times a year at the church door, which was not, indeed, executed on all the Tolousan Jews, but was, in time, confined to their Syndic, or head magistrate, who received that punishment in the name of the rest. We may add, that, though their credit was very high at court during the life of the treacherous Sedecias, yet they were liable to many insults from the populace in cities at a distance from it. Thus, for instance, those of Beziers, in Languedoc, were yearly driven about, with volleys of stones, from the eve of Palm-Sunday to the Tuesday in Easter-week, from which indignity they at length redeemed themselves by a tribute they paid to the bishop of the place. Indeed, it is no wonder that the Jews, though powerful at court, should be obnoxious to the inhabitants of particular cities.

CHAP. IV.

State of the Jews in the tenth century. Learning begins to flourish. David the head of the captivity. His reign and pride. The Jews numerous and powerful. Heads elected and deposed by vote. Rabbi Hay a descendant of David. Cader's persecution of the Jews. Ezechias head of the captivity. Rise of a new schism. Extinction of the academies. Persecutions under Hakem.

THE tenth century, which is in such discredit with the Christians, was not so unreputable to the Jews. Instead of deploring the gross ignorance that overspread Christianity at that time, they boast that they never had such excellent doctors as then. They erected a new academy in the east, because those which had subsisted for many ages were not sufficient to contain the numbers of professors and scholars. The Arabians applied themselves to study, in spite of the oppression which destroyed the authority of the caliphs. There appeared among them able physicians and logicians; and notwithstanding they had approved the vanity of astronomical predictions, yet they studiously cultivated this science, that was useful at court. The Jews imitated the Arabians: an inclination and genius for learning, which had been extinct, revived among them: however, their progress was interrupted by the divisions that arose between the professors and heads of the captivity. They even saw these academies fall; and the whole nation being expelled the east, was forced to seek a new refuge in Spain and France. They underwent fresh misfortunes through the zeal of the crusaders, who made it a piece of devotion to massacre all the Jews before they proceeded to the conquest of Judaea.

David was the prince of the captivity; a haughty man, who governed this nation with the authority of a king. The Jewish historians complained, that his predecessors couched to the caliphs, and paid them tribute; but that David recovered all his privileges, and enforced them like a king. There were two things that might contribute to this exaltation; the long reign of David, who was head of his nation above thirty years, and the weakness of the caliph Mostader, who then ruled. He was not only young, but so dependent upon his officers, that they deposed him twice; and he had been absolutely deprived of his authority, but that they could not find any person in the family of the Abbassides to substitute in his room. The weakness of the government gave David an opportunity to raise himself, and affect a stately pride. He caused troubles and divisions in the academy of Pundebita, by carrying his authority too high. The Jews had elected Misbischer president of their college: David chose another; and the jealousy of these two professors, who had different privileges, increased the disorder. The division was violent for five years; and there was no way to appease it, but by forming two different schools in the same place.

That of Sora was so fallen from its ancient lustre, that nobody could be found, either willing or able, to teach in it. David sent for one, named Jom Tob; but he being an unqualified man, instead of raising the declining academy, left it as he found it. They were then forced to seek out the Rabbi Saadiah, to fill up the vacancy, and draw scholars to the place. Saadiah, at first, discharged his post with great success. His principal care was to explode the error about the transmigration of souls, that had been dispersed among the Persians for many ages, and was still preserved in the east, notwithstanding the frequent revolutions that happened there, both in the empire and religion. He made some progress in it; but the prince of the captivity desiring him to sign a regulation he had made against the laws, the doctor refused him so unjust a demand. This refusal, which David did not expect, incensed him very much: he upbraided Saadiah with ingratitude, and sent his son to threaten him with the loss of his head, if he did not obey his orders; but the rabbi apprising his scholars of this insult, they mutinied against David, and attacking him in a body, obliged him to retire. The nation divided after the example of its heads, and every one engaged in a party. Saadiah's faction so far prevailed at first, as to get David deposed, and Joseph, his brother, proclaimed prince of the captivity; but his authority lasted not long. David, supported by his party, resumed the government. Saadiah was constrained to fly, and seek a place of retirement, in which he continued seven years; and it was in this sanctuary that he composed most of the works which have perpetuated his name after his death. He came out of it, at last, to be reconciled with his prince; but he had the happiness to survive him, and have the peaceable possession of the academy.

We may learn from this event, that the power of the heads of the academy was almost equal to that of the princes, since the latter could not enact any laws but what were signed by the professor. Moreover there hath been frequent insurrections against each other. Saadias, though a stranger in the east, withstood David, the haughtiest and most potent prince the nation had seen for many ages.

These heads of the academy might at the same time be princes of the captivity, though this did not always happen. Indeed, Hay, one of the sublimés, was at the same time head of the academy and prince of the nation. Besides, the title of prince is often given to the others. They say that such a one reigned alone in the academy; and that the empire of Raf Nehemiah, head of Pundebita, in the middle of the tenth century, lasted eight years; the titles of reign and empire only relating to their instruction. We commonly find, in the Jewish chronicles, the names of these heads of the academy, whilst we see no prince of the nation.

the nation
by vote.

The princes of the nation, and the heads of the academy, were elected by a majority of votes. The example of David, deposed by Saadias's intrigues, proves, that the power of the princes was neither absolute or independent of the people. Besides, the government was not hereditary in a family; and though the son sometimes succeeded the father, yet this rarely happened. The same thing must be said of the heads of the academy; the prince contributed to their election by his authority in the nation; but the doctors gave their votes: the votes and inclinations also of the people were heard, though not always. We find an instance of it in the tenth century, when there was a professor wanting at Pundebita. A very rich merchant offered himself as a candidate for the place: part of the people were for Nehemiah; others declared for the merchant, named Aaron; and this last was chosen. But the other succeeded him seventeen years after.

Flourishing
state of the
Jews.

The nation was in so flourishing a condition at that time, that nine hundred thousand Jews lived in the city of Pheruts Schibbur. This name signifies the rupture of Sapor; and, according to this etymology, Sapor should be acknowledged for the founder of this city; and, amongst many kings of Persia of this name, it might be attributed to Sapor II. who took Valerian prisoner, and treated him so cruelly: for this prince not only enlarged his kingdom by many conquests, but also built many cities in them, and called them by his name. Some give this honour to a rabbin, called Schiabbour, or Sapor, who founded the academy. In the mean time it was not the academy, but the city it stood in, that bore this name. It was situated five miles from Babylon: and if it had nine hundred thousand Jews in it, it must have been peopled by that nation, and also of prodigious extent; for there are very few cities in the world that contain within their walls so many inhabitants. Scherira, who was made president of this school, kept it flourishing for thirty years together. He was a mortal enemy of the Christians, and particularly of the monks, whom he wrote against, and called forgers. This rendered him the more acceptable to his disciples, who commonly look upon these outrages as so many acts of zeal. Scherira, finding himself advanced in years, resigned his place to his son Hay, the most excellent of all the doctors.

David.

It is said, that this doctor descended, in a direct line, from David the prophet, and king of Judæa. As a proof of it, they affirm, that he had a lion in his escutcheon, which was also in the arms of the ancient kings of Judæa. But his principal glory did not accrue from so illustrious a birth: he distinguished himself in his nation by many different works, which he published upon purchases, sales, and wages. He has one upon the interpretation of dreams. Another contains his questions upon the book of Jetira, or the formation, in which we find the manner they formerly wrote the name of Jehovah at Jerusalem. Hay was a poet, and some of his verses are still remaining; in which he instructs mankind also in the duties of piety. He had so great a reputation, that they came from the east and west to consult him. He became head of the academy of Pundebita, as well as of Pheruts Schibbur, in which he had been professor from nine and twenty years of age. It seems too that he was elected prince of the captivity; but happening to draw upon him the jealousy of his own nation, both he and his father fell into disgrace.

The caliph, who then reigned, was called Cader. Though he was of the house of the Abbassides, he lived privately with a neighbouring prince, who reigned in the marshes that are formed by the waters of the Tigris and Euphrates. But the sultan having deposed Thai, set him upon the throne. He quickly shewed himself worthy of the empire he was raised to. He reformed the abuses that had crept into the state, and extended his care as far as Egypt, where he proved to the Fathemites, that reigned there, that they were not Aly's family, as they boasted. Cader, who lived eighty-one years, and reigned above forty, resolved also to give a check to the Jews, who had taken too great advantage of the preceding troubles, and usurped an undue authority. Scherira and Hay were accused to him as men of wealth and power, who governed the nation; and they were put in prison. The caliph fleeced them of all their wealth, and caused Scherira to be hanged, though at that time above an hundred years old. Hay had the good fortune to escape this violence. He went on with his lectures in the academy, and taught there till 1037. This was the last of the Excellents.

After Hay's death, Ezechias was elected prince of the captivity; but his reign was short and unfortunate, for, after two years, the caliph arrested him with all his family, and put them to death, except two sons, that fled into Spain. The academies were shut up, and the learned obliged to seek sanctuary in the west, whither the persecuted people followed them.

It was in the reign of Ezechias that the schism arose between the children of Asher and Naphtali, who are thought to be the first Masoreths; at least they are the first grammarians who applied themselves to review and correct the Scripture. Father Simon, well versed in this subject, who saw Aaron's manuscript and printed corrections, has no esteem for them, believing them to be later than the Masora, and pretty modern. We ought not to judge of them by the noise or schism these two masters raised in the nation, for people often divide in the schools upon niceties of grammar. But if their corrections be trifling, the authority of the Hebrew text is still the greater for it; for it is a proof that the original text had so long preserved its authenticity, and stood in need of no great correction.

The persecution, which continued in the east, entirely ruined the affairs of this nation. The house of the Abbassides, which had always favoured the Jews, being degraded from its authority, the Sultan Gela le Doulat, who reigned by the name of Cajem, resolved to extirpate them; and to that purpose shut up their academies, which were never opened after. He banished the professors, or obliged them to banish themselves, and to translate their academies into the west. He destroyed the prince of the captivity with his family. The people also suffered extremely in this persecution, which was so bloody, as to reduce the Jews to an inconsiderable body, disperse them into the deserts of Arabia, and drive them for refuge into the west.

The Jewish historians say, that the caliphs, being jealous of the grandeur in which the prince of the captivity appeared among them, began to fear the exaltation of some one of David's family, who should seize upon the government and the crown. They gave out, that it would be scandalous for masters to be obliged to obey their slaves, and resolved to kill him; which resolution they executed as he passed with the princes of the academies. The news of it was immediately brought to the court, which sent a detachment of guards to wrest the prince of the captivity out of the mutineers hands; but but they arrived too late. However, the nation took advantage of this accident, and resolved to have no prince for the future, that they might no more excite the jealousies of potentates, and to wait till Providence should please to send them one who might give them an entire deliverance.

It is here that most authors put an end to the heads of the captivity, and eastern academies: tho' Benjamin de Tudela, who travelled in the following century into the east, to pay a visit to his brethren, still found a prince of the captivity among them. Petachia, who went from Ratisbonne with the same design, and in the same century, found a prince of the dispersed nation at Bagdad, in Persia. His name was Samuel; and he asserts that he traced his genealogy as high as the prophet of that name. The princes of the captivity were rarely seen afterwards, and preserved only the name without the authority. They might have some school in the thirteenth century, which they stiled an academy; but those of Sora and Pundebita, and all the rest which had made a figure, were abolished in the year 1039.

was persecuted under Hakem.

The Jews underwent a fresh persecution in Egypt, in the reign of Hakem, the third caliph of the house of the Fathemites. His father had left him young in the hands of a tutor, in the year 996. He was a man of weak intellects, and suffered himself to be misled by D. Arar, an impostor, who was slain, notwithstanding his interest with the caliph. After his death, an impostor, named Hamzah, succeeded him, and from him arose a new religion, opposite to all others, which was that of the Drusi, little known to us, but which he had blended with a vast number of extravagant notions not worth repeating.

Hakem declared himself an enemy both to the Jews and Christians, as the only sects that opposed his doctrines. He ordered the former to wear a mark, by which they might be known: he caused their synagogues to be demolished, and forced them, by scourges, to quit their religion, and to turn Drusi. But being inconstant in disposition, he quickly changed his opinion, and permitted them to return to their old religion. This prince died in the year 1026, in Egypt, where he had reigned.

Men of learning in the eleventh century. The languages and sciences generally cultivated. Few learned men in France. R. Gerson and his disciples.

THE divisions and wars that troubled Spain, during the tenth century, afforded the Jews of this country great tranquillity. Abdalla, who was caliph there, had the mortification to see his uncle rebel against him, and make powerful efforts to wrest the empire out of his hands. But being defeated, he was obliged to take sanctuary among the Christians, where he caused himself to be baptized, purchasing his quiet and life by a feigned conversion. Abderamus III. often entered the territories of Christian kings, and fought many bloody battles, which were not advantageous to either party, because each claimed the victory, and re-assembling their forces, soon after prosecuted the war with new vigour. This prince, who reigned above fifty years, had at last so reduced the number of his enemies, that they could find no soldiers. They proposed to purchase a truce, or to retire before his army, which amounted to eighty thousand strong. But the boldest counsel having prevailed, the Christians, who were but an handful of men, encountered them with that resolution, that the Arabians betook themselves to flight, leaving the field of battle with their spoils. His son Hakem renewed the war, and besieged the city of Leon; but the inhabitants defended themselves so vigorously that he was forced to raise the siege. Hescham had the famous Almanfor for his general, who had this title given him upon account of the great victories he had obtained both over the Spaniards and Arabians. The latter, though the caliph's subjects, often rebelled against him. One of his officers had the insolence to give out that he was dead, causing a body to be buried in the tomb of his ancestors, in order to delude the people. He usurped his place, and reigned, till a faction, being convinced that their old caliph was alive, brought him out of his prison, and restored him to the throne. But he fell from it a second time, by a new commotion that happened at Toledo and Corduba. He quitted Spain, and went to live in Africa, after a reign of thirty-three years. Such was the condition of the Arabians in Spain, who were continually at war with the Christians; and who, besides these wars, were divided, and in frequent rebellions against their caliph.

Neither were the Christians more at rest. Ordoin, king of Leon, had so exasperated Castile, that it resolved, after his death, to form itself into a republic. To that end it actually divided the government between two persons, one whereof took care of the civil policy, and the other had the command of military affairs. Froila the Cruel drew upon him the hatred of the people by the barbarity of his reign, which lasted not above fourteen months. Division entered into the family of Christian princes as well as the Arabians. In the reign of Ramides a new division happened, which forced him to give up part of Castile to his uncle, and the city Compostella for his capital. He presently named a person of quality to be bishop of it: but his scandalous misconduct causing his expulsion, his father called in the Arabians to restore him. This kindled a civil war, and Compostella was often taken and retaken.

State of the Christians.

Besides those learned doctors who were natives of Spain, Providence furnished the Jews with a famous one, viz. Moses, surnamed Clad with a Sack. This man having left the east, and being taken by corsairs, and carried with his son upon the coast of Spain, was ransomed by the Jews of Corduba. This was done out of charity, without any knowledge of his merit. By putting himself in the corner of a school, as a layman and a beggar, who had no other than a sack, wherewith he wrapped himself up to cover his nakedness, he argued so profoundly upon all the questions that were proposed, that the president of the school yielded his place to him. He was created chief of the nation, with a good salary. But having great inclination to die in his country, he resolved to return thither; though the caliph would not suffer him, for reasons of state. The Talmud was then very little known in Spain; and when any controversy arose, the synagogues sent their deputies to Bagdad to have them decided. Hakem, who was caliph in Spain, and did not like his subjects passing frequently into the east, where the Abbassides, the enemies of his house, reigned, and who had destroyed it, was highly gratified by Moses' teaching the Talmud to the Spaniards. He retained him in order to stop the course of these deputations, which gave him, perhaps, some suspicion. Moses reigned a long time; and Enoch, his son, ascended his throne.

Account of Moses surnamed Clad with a Sack

Thus it is the historians change a judicial seat into a throne, the authority whereof extended but over some fugitives, and was purely precarious.

Hescham II. king of Corduba, whom the Jews call Aschafez, did more than his father; for he ordered the Talmud to be translated into Arabic, either from curiosity to learn what was in a book so cried up by the Jews, or to make it more common in the nation, in order to prevent the pilgrimages to Bagdad and Jerusalem.

The Talmud translated into Arabic.

R. Joseph undertook this great work, and very successfully accomplished it: but he grew so haughty upon it, that he could no longer bear Enoch should be preferred to him to be chief of the nation. He broke with him: their division made a noise: the synagogues engaged in it: but Enoch had the more numerous party. Joseph was excommunicated. He appealed appealed to the king; but Hescham would not meddle with this affair, either out of policy, or because living in dependence upon his haged, or grand chamberlain, he was not at liberty to protect his favourites. Joseph, being deprived of the protection he expected from court, left Spain, and took the road to Bagdad, where he thought to find a retreat near the famous Hay; but he gave him to understand, that he could not receive him, because he was excommunicated by the Spanish synagogues. He remained therefore at Damascus, where he died, without being able to procure a revocation of the sentence which had been pronounced against him.

Revolutions
liphship.

The divisions of the Saracens increased more and more in Spain during the eleventh century. There had been a long time a design to dethrone that branch of the Omniades which reigned there. Their weakness had so disgusted the people, that, after they had changed their master, they swore never to admit any man more of that family. The usurpers were not much more successful, for the people were quickly involved in a new search of a sovereign. One of the Omniades, who survived the ruin of his house, offered himself to them. They represented to him, that, by attempting to ascend the throne, he incurred a certain death. But ambition overcame love of life: "Kill me to-morrow," (said he,) "provided you make me this day a king."

R. Samuel
of the Jews.

The revolutions in Spain were advantageous to the Jews; for R. Samuel Levi became secretary and minister of state to the king of Granada, who afterwards made him prince of his nation, and he employed his credit at court in protecting it. He even scattered his bounties among foreigners; for the African, Egyptian, and Babylonian doctors were his pensioners. The Jews had the satisfaction to see his son succeed him in his posts; and the only thing which moderated their joy was the haughtiness of this young man, whose riches had rendered him proud; whereas his father had preserved his humility in his greatest exaltation.

Persecuted
in Granada.

But an unexpected turn of affairs disturbed the repose and tranquillity they enjoyed. Joseph Hallevy, one of the learned men of that age, set up for a converter of the Mussulmen. The translation of the Talmud into Arabic, which was made some years before, facilitated this design, though it miscarried. The king of Granada could not bear this insult offered the established religion; so that the Jewish rabbi was put into prison, and afterwards to death. The persecution began by the king's order, in which fifteen hundred families in this one kingdom greatly suffered. This calamity was the more sensibly felt, because prosperity had made them rich and powerful. They were apprehensive lest the neighbouring kings should imitate so dreadful an example: but the violence was soon stopped, and went no farther than the kingdom of Granada.

They would have undergone a more severe and destructive oppression under king Ferdinand, who, at the instigation of his bigoted wife, was going to sanctify his war against the Saracens by the extirpation of the Jews, had not the bishops, and even the pope, (Alexander II.) put a stop to his furious zeal, by publicly opposing and condemning it. But what most probably extricated them out of all danger from that monarch and his successor was, the revolution which the Moors occasioned in Africa; in consequence of which Alphonso, distressed on every side, found himself obliged to befriend and care for, instead of oppressing them, in order to procure their money and assistance. Accordingly they were promoted by him to considerable posts, and obtained such other privileges, that pope Gregory quite disapproved of them; though his censures could not prevail upon Alphonso to retract them.

Peter I. his grandson, had not more regard to the exhortations of Nicolas of Valencia. The crusade being published in Spain, as in other Christian kingdoms, Peter resolved to engage in this war against the infidels. Nicolas represented to his king, that it was in vain to go in quest of foreign enemies so far, when he had so many at home; and added, that the Jews had such an inveterate hatred to the Christians, that they never met them without denouncing curses on their heads, with many other articles as absurd and ridiculous; to which the king, who was averse to persecution, only lent a deaf ear. However, the moderation of this prince did not save the Jews from being massacred by the crusaders in several other parts of Spain.

Notwithstanding these pretensions, this country had abundance of Jewish doctors in the eleventh century. Samuel Cophni, born at Corduba, published a commentary upon the Pentateuch, the manuscript whereof is in the Vatican library. Those that have read it esteem it as a fine piece, but confess it has a great many allegories. He had a dispute with a divine of his nation, and died in the year 1034.

learning in the eleventh century.

At that time appeared the five Isaacs. One of them was called Isaac Alphesi, as coming out of Africa, from the kingdom of Fez, into Spain. He passed for one of the most learned men of his time, and became prince of the exile in Spain. His epitaph, written in Ipondaic verse, which shews that at that time they observed quantity, after the manner of the Greeks and Latins, was a most noble one. The second of the Isaacs was the son of Baruch. He derived his genealogy from the ancient Baruch, Jeremy's secretary; and pretended that his family, which came into Spain in Titus's time, had subsisted there till then. He understood Latin, Greek, and Arabic. He had studied the mathematics, and was so eminent in this science, that the king of Granada, called the mathematician for his passionate love of it, sent for him to court to be instructed by him. He was received there with such applause, and lived with such satisfaction with the African Saracens, that he became unmindful of his country, and continued there to his death, which happened in the year 1004. He had a violent quarrel with the first of the Isaacs, surnamed Alphesi. They could not be reconciled whilst they lived: but, at the hour of death, one of them gave an example of repentance, and the other of charity. Isaac, the son of Baruch, died first; and finding himself ill, sent his son to beg his enemy's pardon, and to throw himself into his arms, as into those of a patron and a faithful friend. The son obeyed: Alphesi received him into his house, treated him as a child, and continued teaching him, to his death, the mysteries of the law.

Another more general division soon arose. The learned rabbins multiplying in Spain, in the eleventh century, gave birth to many controversies respecting the study of the sciences, whereof the Talmudists designed to rob their scholars, to oblige them to an implicit submission to their principles. They maintained that the study of languages, and the human sciences, was condemned from the emperor Titus's time, lest the people, dispersed among the nations, should be drawn into their idolatry, by the charms of the politeness of their writings. The Postille, annexed to the text of the Mishnah, contains a malediction pronounced against him who keeps swine, or teaches his son Greek; as if it was equally impure to feed an unclean beast, and to give men a good education.

Their

These laws were not always religiously observed. It was impossible for the Jews who dwelt in Egypt not to speak Greek; for those of Rome, not to understand Latin; and for the Spaniards, mingled with the Saracens, not to make a continual use of Arabic. R. Salomon, who taught at Barcelona, in the eleventh century, prevailed so far as to have those rigorous decrees of the fathers tempered; but he durst not abolish them. He pronounced an anathema, and a sentence of excommunication, against all that began to study Greek before twenty years of age. The bounds being once removed, R. Mar set himself above the anathema, which Salomon had decreed against the young students, and restored them to a full liberty. They applied themselves therefore to the languages, mathematics, and other sciences, which produced a considerable number of great men.

The
language sciences generally revived.

France was not so fruitful in famous rabbins as Spain; and we might even complain of its barrenness during all the centuries which we have examined, there being not above five or six doctors to be found who were of any note. The most famous was R. Gerson, whom some will have to be born in Germany, at Mentz. However, he was a Frenchman, or, at least, published his book of Constitutions there. It is probable he had less respect paid him in his life-time than after his death; for they hesitated a long time about the reception of his collection of laws, which began not to be in vogue till the middle of the thirteenth century. He was afterwards called the Light of the French Captivity.

One of his chief disciples was Jacob, the son of Jekar, a great musician, and who deeply studied cases of conscience. The succeeding doctors constantly quote his decisions with approbation; and they are received as laws that cannot be transgressed without criminality. It is said he died the same year as his master. Salomon, who had studied under these two great masters, made some figure. Chronologers are not agreed, however, upon this article; for some make him study in the year 1140, in the middle of the twelfth century; and others make him die thirty-five years before.

He had another famous disciple, whom the lawyers call Albarcellonita. This was Judas, a Barcelona doctor, who wrote a treatise upon the privileges of women. He published another upon the times, wherein he historically recounted the different ways the Jews had reckoned the times. Their first epocha was that of their departure from Egypt. They began another at the creation of a king, because the form of their government was then changed. There was a third upon Alexander the Great's entering into Jerusalem, which was followed to the tenth century of the Christian church. For Scherira, who lived at that time, obliged his nation to calculate the years from the creation of the world. He also published sermons.

Moses Hadarscian, that is to say, the Preacher, was also one of Gerson's disciples. They began at that time to make sermons in the synagogues, which had been much neglected hitherto; and perhaps Gerson introduced this custom, since we find two of his disciples who became famous by their preaching. Moses, who came from Narbonne, was doubtless the most eloquent, having the title of preacher given him by way of excellency. This rabbi lived in the middle of the eleventh century, and died in the year 1070, with the glory of leaving the famous Salomon the lunatic his disciple.

C H A P. VI.

The Pseudo-Josephus, a native of France, in this century. His history fabulous. Jews in Hungary. Their state in Germany and Bohemia. Protected by the emperor. Massacred by the crusaders. A second crusade productive of the same consequences as the former.

AS we are treating of the French rabbies of this century, we must not omit the author of the pretended history of Josip Ben Garion, whom the Jews have substituted for the Greek historian Josephus. This Jewish impostor, to gain the greater credit with his readers, begins with giving himself out for a royal prince and priest of the Jewish nation, in whose person Providence had united those two dignities to war against their enemies. He calls himself the Josephus full of the spirit of wisdom and understanding, of counsel, fortitude, knowledge, and of fear of the Lord, who sacrificed his life for the sanctuary and for his nation. He sacrilegiously adds, that one of his soldiers one day cried aloud to him, "Thou art the man of God. Blessed be the God of Israel, who hath created the soul that animates thee, and hath endowed thee with such extraordinary wisdom." And when taken by the Romans, their army asked each other with tears, "Is that the person so admired among the Jews, and so dreaded by the Romans? How is he caught, who was alone once able to fill our army with terror, and hath spread throughout the universe the fame of his valiant deeds?" Titus himself was no less taken with his person and courage, and raised him above all the priests and Levites of his nation.

His imposture succeeded so well, by his pirating, from the Greek and original Josephus, such facts as were to his purpose, misrepresenting, and adding others, and couching his history in the Hebrew tongue, that the Greek copy became not only neglected, but suspicious, and at length rejected as a forgery by those of his nation. So that we need not wonder if many of them have been deceived by it, and extolled it to the skies. But as this author and his history have been fully confuted by several able and authentic writers, and the many falsehoods, contradictions, and absurdities, which plainly prove its forgery, amply exploded, we shall therefore proceed with a detail of the Jewish affairs as they were circumstanced in other nations in Europe.

We begin to find them flourishing in Hungary towards the latter end of the eleventh century, when Ladislaus, who then reigned, convened a synod, in which were made several regulations, importing, that if a Jew should marry, or, as the act words, "sibi associaverit," a Christian woman, or buy a Christian slave, they should be set at liberty, and the price given for them be confiscated to the bishop. His son Coloman being come to the throne, forbade them, by a new law, to use the Christian slaves; but permitted them to buy and cultivate lands, on condition they used no other but Pagan slaves, and settled only in such places as were under the jurisdiction of a bishop. These two laws shew the Jews to have been numerous and powerful in that kingdom.

The Jewish nation was extremely multiplied in Germany; it had even built synagogues in most of the considerable cities, particularly in Triers, Cologne and Mentz. It had penetrated even to Franconia. This people passed from thence into Bohemia; where, in the eleventh century, they performed such considerable services to the Christians, against the irruptions of the barbarians, that they were allowed the privilege of a synagogue. They entered into Hungary. It is said they were terrified by a variety of prodigies, which happened at the beginning of the eleventh century; and fearing the end of the world was at hand, they turned Christians. These prodigies, however, had not converted such numbers of them, but that many were disposed to acts of violence and outrage.

A priest, named Goteskal, put himself at the head of fifteen thousand banditti he had got together in Germany, and declared war against the Jews. So pious a pretence procured him the veneration of the people, and the protection of kings. He over-ran Franconia in a little time; from whence he passed into Hungary, where he had, at first, an entire liberty to exercise his cruelties; but when it was perceived, that, under the pretence of religion, this army plundered and ravished the wives of the Christians as well as the Jews, they surprized them in their debaucheries, and Goteskal was slain, with the best part of his troops. So tragical an end, however, hindered not the count of Linenguen from making the same attempt. He ravaged a part of Germany, by declaring himself a persecutor of the Jews; but attempting to pass into Hungary, found the passage stopped. Being resolved to force it, he vigorously attacked those that kept it; and, elated with success, had already divided the kingdom with his conspirators; when the Hungarians, attacking them unexpectedly, as they were deliberating, put them to the rout. The emperor Henry, who was then at Ratibonne, declared himself in favour of the Jews, restored them to the places from whence they had been expelled, and made their plunderers refund. This indemnification occasioned fresh complaints and accusations, ■ they were charged with having magnified their losses, in order to enrich themselves by ■ more plentiful restitution.

The crusades rekindled a fresh zeal against the Jews. They complain that these votaries, passing through Cologne, Mentz, Wormes, and Spiers, committed a massacre, from the month of April till July, in which were stabbed and drowned five thousand persons; and that the number of those who were forced to abjure the religion of their fathers cannot be ascertained. They do not exaggerate the matter; on the contrary, historians amplify the number, with the addition of hideous circumstances. They assert that fourteen hundred of them were burnt at Mentz; and that, from the resistance and disorder which happened on that occasion, half the city was reduced to ashes. Those of Wormes at first retired to the bishop; but he would not receive them, unless they turned Christians. The people suffered them not to deliberate long: some embraced Christianity, which they abjured as soon as the form was over; and others destroyed themselves. Something like this happened at Triers. The women, seeing the crusaders coming, murdered their own children, saying, "It were better to send them thus into Abraham's bosom, than to abandon them to the Christians." Others, laden with stones, threw themselves into the river, and were drowned; and some fled to the bishop's castle. Egilbert, who resided in it, preached them a sermon, by which they were apparently converted; but the year following all of them, except one, relapsed into Judaism. The bishop of Spire had more humanity; for he not only protected the fugitives, but caused some of their persecutors to be hanged. The mischief went so far, that the Bavarian annalists reckon twelve thousand that died in that country; and others affirm, that the number of those who perished in Germany was almost incredible.

A second
crusade.

Another crusade was published fifty years after. Rodolphus, who was commissioned to preach it up on the banks of the Rhine, did it with great success. As it was one of the articles of his religion and his doctrine, that the enemies of Christianity were first to be taken off, and those stabbed who were near at hand, before they went to seek them in foreign lands, the people were inflamed by his exhortations: but the massacre was not so great as designed, because part of them took their flight betimes, and retired to Nuremberg, and other cities depending upon the emperor, under whose protection they found more security. We must do justice to St. Bernard, and acknowledge that Rodolphus's doctrine did not please him. He wrote to the archbishop of Mentz, whom this hermit had inflamed by his preaching, to prove to him, that he ought to look upon the persecution of the Jews as inhuman; and therefore he advised that he might be sent back to his desert.

Nevertheless, the flame was spread far and near by his trumpeters, not only in Germany, but in most other parts of Europe, and great numbers of Jews were massacred, if we may credit their chronologers, while others, being driven into despair by the cruelties they were likely to undergo, put an end to their own existence. With these persecutions ended the eleventh century.

WITH respect to the state of the Jews in the east during the twelfth century, we shall be obliged to refer, as the best guide we can procure, to Benjamin, surnamed of Tudela, a city of Navarre, the place of his nativity, who tells us that he had visited most of these parts. His accounts, indeed, sometimes appear fabulous; nor has he scrupled to interlard them with absurd and incredible stories to raise the credit of his nation.

Benjamin
of Tudela's
character and travels.

Our author informs us, that he found several considerable synagogues, and a number of Jews, who lived there at ease, and enjoyed the liberty of their religion unmolested. That the city of Pethora, upon the banks of the Euphrates, contained 4000 Jews.

Jews in east from
account.

He found another 7000 also at Almozal, which answers to the ancient Nineveh; the one having been built from the ruins of the other, upon the opposite bank of the Tigris, and being only separated by a bridge. There was Zaccheus, a descendant of the house of David. There was also a famous astronomer, called Beren Alpherec, who served as a chaplain to king Zin-Aldin. It may seem strange that a Jew should officiate as chaplain to a Mussulman; for Zin-Aldin was of that religion, and brother to Noraldin, king of Syria, whom the Mussulmen reverence, not only as one of their most illustrious conquerors, but as one of their greatest saints. But perhaps this Jewish astronomer did not scrupulously weigh the difference of religions, but conformed his own to that of the prince he served, as their nation are so apt to temporize.

Benjamin, before he arrived at Bagdad, passed through Rohobod, where he found 2000 persons of his nation. Carchemis, famous for the defeat of Pharaoh Nachor, and situate upon the banks of the Euphrates, contained five hundred. Pumbedita was but two days journey from hence. But this city, so well known, had changed its name, being then called Aliobari, or Alnebar. He discovered here some footsteps of the grandeur of his nation; for there was the tomb of Bostenai, that prince of the captivity who had married ■ daughter of the king of Persia. He observed also those of two illustrious doctors, with the synagogues they had built before their death; but it was no longer that flourishing academy of scholars whose chiefs had been so famous in former ages: there was only 2000 Jews in it, some of whom applied themselves to the study of the law.

of Pumbedita.

The same fate had befallen that of Sora; of which the author is content to revive the remembrance, and call to mind, that many heads of the captivity, descended from the house of David, had taken up their residence there. He only celebrates the city and academy of Nahardea. He observes also of Nahardea, that its schools were demolished, and the doctors had retired into the west.

The authors of the Talmud, and the excellent doctors, were no longer found at Sora and Pumbedita, in Benjamin's time; nor even in other places, where there were still many Jews.

The Persians ascribe great antiquity to this capital. It was built by Almanzor, and afterwards became the residence of the succeeding caliphs. Benjamin gives ■ magnificent description of their palace and city. The reigning caliph was invested with a supreme, and even despotic, authority. He kept his brothers chained in their respective palaces, because they had conspired against him. His subjects hardly ever saw him, though he was very affable to others. The pilgrims that passed that way earnestly desired a sight of him; but, instead of shewing himself, he caused a skirt of his robe to be hung upon the window, that every one might see it; and a herald cried out, "Go in peace; for our Lord, the light of the Ishmaelites, is favourable to you."

He

power in ecclesiastical affairs.

He was supreme in ecclesiastical as well as civil authority. The people believed him almost equal to Mahomet, and he held the same rank among the Mussulmen, as the pope has among the Christians. At the fast of Ramadan he came out of his palace, clad in sumptuous attire, having, among other articles, a piece of black cloth upon his head, to signify, that all his glory was only vanity, and that joy was quickly changed into sorrow. He was attended by all the great officers of his court, and a vast multitude of people, who came that day from far to have the satisfaction of seeing him. When he arrived at the oratory, near the gate of the city, and had received the acclamations of the people, he kissed his robe to give a blessing, and ascending into a lobby of the chapel, expounded the Mahometan law to them. He then killed a camel, pieces of which he distributed to his principal officers, who looked upon it as an extraordinary favour. The ceremony being over, the caliph returned alone to his palace, by the banks of the Tigris, which were covered with thousands of barks; and the ground he had trod was held so sacred, that no one durst walk in the place where he had set the sole of his foot.

Jews fa-
Bagdad under the ca-liph Mo-
taased.

It was under the protection of the caliph Motased, who reigned ten years, that the Jews then lived peaceably at Bagdad. He esteemed them, and had many in his service. He perfectly understood their language, and wrote it; and had also some knowledge of their law. There were but a thousand Jewish inhabitants in this city: and the error of Isaac, the son of Arma, who says there were many thousand Jews, would be deemed a gross one, were we not accustomed to find these Jewish writers magnify whatever contributes to the glory of the synagogue. If there were few inhabitants, there were yet twenty-eight synagogues, and ten tribunals, or councils; at the head whereof were ten eminent persons, employed only upon the affairs of the nation, and called the ten Otiosi, or Idlers. Above these ten was the head of the captivity. He that had then that post was a descendant of David, and his name was Daniel. The Jews gave him the title of Lord; and the Mahometans that of Lord, the Son of David. His authority extended over all the Jews which were in the dominions of the caliph, from Syria to the Iron Gates and the Indies. Our author represents this prince of the captivity as a kind of sovereign; for the Mahometans were obliged to respect him as well as the Jews; and he that, meeting him on the road, refused to rise and salute him, received an hundred stripes. The nation was obliged to have their teachers and doctors from him, who gave the imposition of hands. That he might support his dignity, the merchants of his nation raised an impost in the fairs, and paid him a kind of tribute. Some provisions were also sent him from the remote provinces. Daniel, besides this, had his patrimony and lands that were given him. He kept a table; and had hospitals, where he maintained the poor. But he was forced to purchase this grandeur and liberty, by a tribute paid to the caliph, and by rich presents to the principal officers of his court.

Head of the captivity dependent on

This observation is of great moment, not only because it shews that there was still a prince of the captivity in the twelfth century, though they had been abolished an hundred years before, but farther, we learn, that this head of the captivity had only a power borrowed from the caliph, which he did not exercise till he had received imposition of hands from the infidel prince.

The Jewish rabbies, who pretended that those eastern chiefs were independent of any other monarchs, and still retained the power of life and death, have left no stone unturned to prove that favourite point; insomuch that Origen himself believed that those Assyrian monarchs, under whom they lived, being content with their subjection and dependence, allowed them to govern their people according to their own laws, and to inflict even death on the guilty; and proved it not only from the apocryphal book of Susanna against Africanus, but from more recent instances under the Roman emperors, after the destruction of the temple by Titus. He has been followed by others, both ancient and modern, who pretend they had a power to raise a tribute on the nation, and to punish recusants, as well as other criminals, with death.

Leaving the province of Bagdad, Benjamin passed through Reien, where he found near five thousand Jews, who performed their devotions in a great synagogue. He proceeded towards the ancient Babylon, where was Nebuchodonosor's palace, grown the habitation of owls and reptiles. But some leagues from thence were a thousand Jews, who said their prayers in the palace which Daniel built for his oratory. Hila is but five miles from it, where there are four synagogues, and ten thousand Jews. A little farther were discovered the foundations of the ancient tower of Babel, built immediately after the flood. At length he came to the tomb of Ezekiel, upon the banks of the river Chobar, where there are sixty towers, with a synagogue in each of them. Near this place is another edifice, built by Jeconias, when Evil-merodach gave him his liberty. This palace fronts the Euphrates on one side, and has the Chobar on the other. Thirty-five thousand Jews were employed in this great work for the service of their prince. His picture was still seen in the roof, and those of all the officers who accompanied him; and Ezekiel brings up the rear. This prophet's tomb, which was preserved, drew people from all parts. The heads of the captivity visited it every year with a numerous train. It was a place of devotion, not only for the Jews, but for the Persians, the Medes, and abundance of Mussulmen, who came to bring their presents, and pay their vows at the synagogue. They reverence it as a sacred thing; and therefore no military persons, whether vanquished or victorious, ever touch it. A lamp burnt night and day upon this tomb; and the head of the captivity, and of the councils of Bagdad, furnished oil. There is a rich library; and all that die without issue augment it by sending their books. Here was also seen the original of Ezekiel's prophecies, written with, as they pretended, his own hand.

other eastern parts.

Ezekiel's
tomb.

Coufa had for some time been the capital city of the caliphs; but they had changed their residence. However, Benjamin coming there, found near seven thousand Jews, who had but one synagogue. Jews in Egypt.

Egypt is one of those places where the Jews have resided longest: they were numerous in the twelfth century, when Benjamin paid them a visit. He computes thirty thousand of them in one single city upon the frontiers of Ethiopia, which he calls Chouts. He saw two thousand Jews, and two synagogues, at Misralim, at present Grand Cairo. There was some division among those that inhabited it. The occasion was frivolous; for some who came from Judea, dividing each section of the law, finished the reading of it but once in three years; whilst the other ancient inhabitants of Egypt read it all in one; as was done in Spain, and other places. Here resided the head of all the synagogues of the country, who created the doctors, and supported the interest of the nation with the caliph.

Our traveller was far from forgetting the land of Goshen, where the Israelites dwelt so long. He thought he could observe some tracts of their ancient buildings. Many Jews were retired thither; two hundred were in one place, five hundred in another, and near three thousand in the city of Goshen; as many at Alexandria, and very few at Damietta.

The rest he represents as dispersed in all the other provinces and towns of Egypt in great numbers, though vastly short of what they once were, when the single city of Alexandria was reckoned to contain an hundred thousand of those people.

We now pass into Judæa. Our author went to Tyre, where he found four hundred of his nation, most of whom were glass-makers. This was a profitable trade, because the Tyrian glass was then in great great esteem, and transported far and near by the sea-faring Jews. However, there were some that were learned, particularly in the Talmud; and of these an Egyptian, called R. Ephraim, was the most eminent.

superstitions

The Samaritans had abandoned their capital city; but there were two hundred at Cefarea, and an hundred at Shechem, which they made the seat of their religion. They had priests descended from Aaron, who never matched into other families, that they might more certainly preserve the succession of the priesthood. They offer sacrifices upon Mount Gerizim in all their solemn feasts: and affirm, that their altar was built with the stones the tribes placed in the Jordan, when they passed this river under Joshua's conduct. They are very superstitious about washings, and the choice of their cloaths: they religiously preserve those which they wear in the synagogue, and never put them on on other days.

Jews in Jerusalem.

It is astonishing that Jerusalem, where God had once fixed his temple and name, which the Jews ought to consider as his habitation, was almost entirely abandoned by that nation. Our author found not above two hundred persons, who were, for the most part, dyers of wool, and every year purchased the privilege of the monopoly of that trade. They lived all together under David's tower, and made there a very mean figure.

In Upper Galilee.

If Jerusalem had so few Jews in it, the rest of the Holy Land was still more depopulated. Benjamin found two of them in one city, and twenty in another; most of whom were dyers. He says, that Schunem was one of the cities that had the greatest number, wherein he reckoned three hundred.

Ascalon, built some leagues from that, and of which the Holy Scripture often speaks, as belonging to the Philistines, contained five hundred and fifty-three persons: the greatest number was made of Samaritans; the least of the Caraites, who rejected traditions; and the rest were Talmudists.

It was in Upper Galilee that the nation was in greatest repute after the ruin of Jerusalem, for the Jews retired thither upon the destruction of the holy city. The academy of Tiberias grew famous from its doctors, and there the Jerusalem Talmud was composed. Many changes happened in it from that time to the twelfth century, for Benjamin found hardly any Jews in Galilee of the Gentiles. He saw at Tiberias but fifty persons of his nation, a synagogue, and some ancient tombs. In fine, he only celebrates it for its excellent waters and hot baths.

Account of another Jewish tra-

Aben-Ezra gives a different account of Tiberias from that of Benjamin de Tudela: for, having travelled there twenty-five or thirty years after him, he says, that he consulted the doctors that were in it. So considerable a change could not have happened to this city in so short a time, as to restore an academy, and produce doctors: nor is it probable that Benjamin, who, on all occasions, does so much honour to his nation, designed to detract from the lustre of Tiberias.

These two travellers, however, may be reconciled in a degree, by observing, that there was a synagogue, and, of consequence, some rabbins, who managed it; and these, perhaps, were the doctors Aben-Ezra consulted in his travels. This city, having lost its walls, continued a long time exposed to the perpetual incursions of the Arabians, who often pillaged it; till Solyman walled it in. This advantage made it more populous. The author of a letter, entitled, "The Genealogies of the Righteous of the Land of Israel," says, that there were in his time two kinds of academies, situate without the gates of Tiberias, one small, and the other very mean. In effect, Rabbi Juda Zona, who, from a Jew, turned Christian, and died at Rome in the middle of the last century, pursued his studies in one of the academies of Tiberias. There was another much more esteemed academy at Sapheta; but as Benjamin does not mention it, it is reasonable to suppose it was not yet erected.

Benjamin passed through Greece, and found mount Parnassus (which had been so long the mansion of Apollo and the Muses) inhabited by two hundred Jews, who cultivated it, and sowed pulse upon it. They had some rabbins; but, whatever be the reasons, they have been since forbidden to settle within some leagues of it.

There were three hundred Jews at Corinth. Thebes, so well known in antiquity, but infinitely decayed in the twelfth century, supported two thousand Jews, silk-workers and dyers. The rabbins there were so learned, that none but those of Constantinople could equal them: though we hear nothing of their productions in that kind. Two of the most ingenious were Samaritans: but it is a question, whether they had not renounced their schism and opinion, to engage in the study of traditions, since they taught the rabbins. There were some at Patras, at Lepanto, and in most of the cities of the empire; but their number was inconsiderable, there being reckoned but fifty in one, and twenty in another.

Benjamin, leaving Greece, arrived at Ægriphon, a great city, situate on the sea-coast, where merchants rendezvoused from all parts of the world, and wherein were two hundred Jews. It is supposed this was the ancient Chalcis, in the neighbourhood of Negropont. From thence he went to Jabasterisa, another stately city, containing an hundred Jews. There were as many at Robenica, which is but a day's journey remote from it; and about an half from the River of Dogs, (Günopotamus,) through which he entered into Walachia, in his way to Constantinople, whither he at length arrived. He observes, that there were there about two thousand Jews, silk weavers and merchants. Besides this, there were five hundred Caraites, who lived peaceably with the other Jews; but were, however, separated from them by a wall, to prevent their communication. They were all placed in the suburbs of Galata, or Pera, upon the banks of the Straights, which habitation had been long ago assigned them by Theodosius; for which reason these suburbs were called by Frenchmen, "The Jewry." They had hitherto preserved the privilege of depending only upon the governor of the suburbs; but Manuel deprived them of this privilege, and submitted them to the common judges. It is probable that this prince had already done it when Benjamin came there; since he represents his nation as very odious in his reign; though his physician, who was a Jew, did all he could to protect them. It was not only unlawful for them to ride on horseback into the city, but the Greeks would ride in crowds, revile, and maltreat them. They broke open their doors, defiled their waters, and pelted them with mire; and yet they have continued there ever since that time.

Benjamin passed into Italy. He observed that, at that time, the Genoese enriched themselves by the pirates they sent to sea. The burghers, being divided one against another, had almost all of them towers on their houses, from whence they made war: They reckoned ten thousand of these towers in Pisa, designed for the same use. These two cities had but very few Jews in them. He came to Rome, which he represents as the capital of the Edomites, and the pope as the head of their religion, whom he describes a great prince; and affirms, that there were many learned rabbies there, that did honour to their nation.

There were Jews also at Capua, where resided the prince of the nation. There were doctors famous throughout the universe; and yet there were but three hundred inhabitants of this nation. From thence he proceeded to Naples, where he found five hundred inhabitants of his nation. There were an hundred more of them at Salerno; amongst whom the priest Solomon, the Greek Elias, and the R. Abraham of Narbonne, were of the greatest eminence. There were Jews also at Maffi, Benevento, Ascoli, and Trani, in the kingdom of Naples; which is the rendezvous of those who embark for the pilgrimage of the Holy Land. He only found one at Corfu: but the number was greater in Sicily: he he reckoned two hundred at Messina, five hundred at Palermo; and in all these places they paid no tribute

Jews in Germany, Bohemia, &c.

He travelled from thence into Germany, where he found the Jews not only more numerous, quiet, and peaceable, but likewise more zealous, devout, and hospitable to strangers. They bewailed the desolation of their city and temple; and expressed a longing expectation of hearing the voice of the turtle dove, as they termed it; by which they meant their glorious recall into that once happy land. He penetrated as far as Bohemia, which, he tells us, was then called the New Canaan, because the inhabitants sold their children to all the neighbouring nations.

This traveller also visited the synagogues of France, which he entered. The number of the Jews was inconsiderable here, as well as at Gironne: but there were three hundred at Narbonne; at the head of which was the rabbi Calaninus, descended in a right line from David; rich and potent, especially in lands, which had been given him by the lords of the country, in recompense for the services he and his ancestors had done. This city was looked upon as the centre of the Jewish nation and their law.

The learned assembly of Lunel.

Montpelier was then full of Mahometans, Greeks, Christians, and Jews; which shews that this city had, at that time, great commerce with the remotest countries. In the neighbourhood was Lunel, where the learned assembly studied the law day and night. Melchullum, the president of it, had five sons, all of eminent abilities; and one of them profoundly versed in the study of the Talmud. The strangers who came to study there were maintained. Beaucayre had also its professors; one of which, called Abraham, disbursed, out of his own finances, all that was necessary to maintain six poor scholars, lest poverty should obstruct their application. There were in the twelfth century synagogues at Arles, Marseilles, and not only in cities, but even in boroughs. Our author concludes with Paris, where Lewis reigned; and there was also an assembly much addicted to the law, and abounding in charity, for it received all the Jews that came there as so many brethren.

General remarks.

We shall only observe, that the Jews were very low in the east in the twelfth century; that they had not been able to restore themselves since the misery that had befallen them above an hundred years before; for they were found only in small numbers upon the banks of the Euphrates, and in the ancient cities, where sometimes they had been reckoned at nine hundred thousand. The crusaders did not suffer them to settle again in Judæa. Thus they were miserable in all the places where they had appeared with greater lustre, and there was a general decline in point both of fame and learning.

R. Petachia's account of the Jews in Tartary and Nineveh.

Before we conclude the twelfth century, it will be necessary to give our readers a short account of some other Jews dispersed into other parts, according to the relation of rabbi Petachia. This rabbi was born at Ratibon, and travelled not only through most parts where Benjamin of Tudela had been, but agrees with him as exactly as if they had copied each other; so that we shall forbear repeating from this what has been said by the other, and take notice only of such facts, or curious particulars, as are not mentioned by him.

The account R. Petachia gives of those Jews he saw in Tartary, is, that they were heretics, that is, they did not observe the traditions of the fathers; and, upon his asking them the reason why they did not, they answered, they had never heard of any. They were, however, such strict observers of the sabbath, that they cut the bread on the preceding which they were to eat on that day, when they hardly stirred from their seats, eat their victuals in the dark, and knew of no other prayers but those contained in the book of psalms.

When he arrived at the New Nineveh, he found about 6000 Jews there, whose chiefs were called No. 50.

David and Samuel, two near relations, descended from David. All the Jews of that country were obliged to pay them a certain capitation, one half of which was to be conveyed to the lieutenant of the king of Babylon, and the other belonged to them. They had lands of their own, fields, gardens, and vineyards, well cultivated. It was, it seems, here, as well as in Persia, Damascus, &c. the custom among them, not to maintain any singers; but the chiefs, who kept at their table a number of doctors, obliged them, sometimes one, sometimes another, to perform that office. Their authority was so great, that they could punish strangers, as well as those of their own nation, when, upon their pleading before them, they were found in the wrong; and there was a prison kept for all such delinquents.

In Bagdad.

Upon his coming to Bagdad, he found about one thousand Jews settled there; but speaks of two thousand disciples, under the chief of the synagogues, and other learned men. These sat on the ground, whilst he taught them from an high desk, covered with a gold tissue; and every one had a copy containing the books of sacred writ. The Jewish women went forth veiled, and avoided speaking to strangers, either in the streets, or even at their homes. We shall only add, with respect to the chiefs here, to what we mentioned out of Benjamin, that, upon the death of Daniel, who left no male successor, the Jews, who had preserved the right of choosing their chief, divided themselves, one party nominating David, and the other Samuel, to that dignity, both lineally descended from David, which division still subsisted when our author left Bagdad, where, he adds, the Jews were treated with great lenity, exempt from any tribute to the king, and only paid a piece of gold to the chief of the synagogue. But they were used with severity in Persia, where, nevertheless, they were computed to amount to 600,000; for which reason he only ventured through one of the Persian cities.

His account of the chiefs

Jews treated with severity in Persia.

He went thence into Judæa, of which he gives much the same account as his brother Benjamin: so that having now gone through the most material account of our two Jewish travellers, we shall supply the rest from other authors, with respect to some other countries and facts by them omitted.

ST. Bernard, who, as already observed, was a great enemy to the Albigenes, espoused the part of the Jews; and not only would not have them persecuted, but repressed the violent zeal of some persons bent upon their destruction, and justified their excess of usuries, which they demanded of the Christians. He alledged, that their future conversion rendered their present toleration necessary; and that, in reality, if their usuries were complained of, there were many Christians who were guilty of more scandalous extortion. St. Bernard also biassed Pope Innocent II. in their favour; for, as he was very serviceable to this pontiff, who was obliged to fly into France, it is thought that he inspired him with these sentiments of gentleness and equity, which were so much the more necessary, because he found himself in a foreign kingdom, where he had need of toleration and assistance. They brought him wholly into their interests when he made his entry into Paris; for they joined in the solemn procession to meet him, ordering a roll of the law law to be carried before them, which they presented to him with great respect; and this is one of the ceremonies of the installation of the popes, which has long continued. The Jews of Rome are obliged to wait for him in the way to St. John de Lateran, and to present him with a copy of the law, when he returns this answer: "I reverence the law which you have received of God by Moses; but I condemn your exposition of it, because you still expect the Messiah, which the apostolical church believes to be Jesus Christ our Lord."

protected by Alexander III.

Some time after they had occasion for pope Alexander the Third's protection, who granted it them so much the easier, because the rabbi Jebiel was superintendant of his house and finances. The people of Italy insulted them in several places, and hindered them from celebrating their feasts. They made their complaints to the pope, who granted them his protection, prohibiting any from taking away their synagogues, and disturbing them as they celebrated their sabbaths, or exercised their religion. But, at the same time, he ordered that they should not have the privilege to cite churchmen before a civil tribunal, nor take possession of the churches by virtue of pledge or sale.

Under so powerful a protection the Jews flourished in Italy till the end of this, and even in the following, century. Cossi, a little borough of the Milanese, grew famous for the multitude of illustrious rabbies it produced. Monza, the city where the kings took the iron crown, produced many others. Ricina Nova, in the marche of Ancona, had the same honour.

Persecuted

The beginning of Alphonso the Eighth's reign in Spain was not favourable to them. He was yet a child, when his father Sanchez the Desired was killed by the Saracens. He ascended the throne young. Moreover, as he was well disposed, he was easily over-reached. Joseph the Jew was his first minister of state, and grew so potent, as to have his coach of state and guards to attend him. Gonzales, an officer under him, having committed some fault that deserved disgrace, resolved to destroy his benefactor and his master. He declared to the king, he could devise the means of procuring him vast sums, in order to which he demanded of this prince eight heads of the Jews at his own choice, which were granted him. Thus he found an expedient at once to gratify two passions, his avarice and hatred of that nation. He chose eight considerable persons, whom he caused to be beheaded, and confiscated their estates, part of which he gave to the king, and converted the rest to his own use. He afterwards offered a much larger sum for the grant of twenty more. But this offer was not accepted, because the king chose rather to reap the profit without the effusion of blood, by obliging the richest of the synagogue to ransom their lives. They did not stop there, for it was debated in council, whether they should all be expelled the kingdom, and their effects seized on, in order to defray the charges of the war, without burthening the people with new impositions. The opinions were divided in council, which gave the Jews time to deliberate among themselves, and to offer considerable sums of money. They were, however, highly rejoiced, when they saw Gonzales fall into disgrace with the king, who caused him to be arrested, notwithstanding his great services; so that his fall established their tranquillity. But what farther ingratiated them with him, was his falling deeply in love with a beautiful young Jewess, to whom he sacrificed his honour and interest, and, for her sake, to her nation; for the Jews taking that advantage, grew so powerful and insolent, that the court and clergy became quite scandalized at it, and at length dissolved the charm, by the death of the beloved object. The Jews took advantage of this happy juncture, and grew so potent, that R. Eliakim, who then lived, and wrote at that time a ritual of the ceremonies observed in all the synagogues, and which is called the Custom of the Universe, reckoned twelve thousand persons of his religion in the city of Toledo.

They were also very numerous in Andalusia, where they applied themselves closely to learning. But study served only to disturb the union of the divines, who were divided into three different sects, which Maimonides, who then lived, has distinguished, and which he looked upon as an unhappy consequence of the abolition of the Sanhedrim. Indeed, whilst that tribunal remained, the oral law was not written, by which they avoided diversity of opinions, and the difficulties and errors that arise from the text of a book, or from the different readings of the copiers.

It was during this quiet interval, or, perhaps, a little before this time, that, according to the Jewish chronologers, copies came to be dispersed of the sacred Hebrew, according to the manuscript of the celebrated Hillel, which had appeared some time before, (at what year cannot be determined, nor what became of it,) in which two verses were found wanting in the twenty-first chapter of the book of Joshua. These were the 36th and 37th verses, which mention the four cities of refuge appointed to the Levites out of the tribe of Reuben; but which, being found in the book, made Grotius imagine they had been since transplanted from thence into the text of Joshua above-mentioned; though without foundation, seeing they are not only found in the Septuagint, or Greek version, which is allowed to be more ancient than Hillel's manuscript, but likewise explain that text, by telling us that those towns were on this side Jordan, and on one side of Jericho.

Their fortune in France was much diversified. In France
They were accused at Paris of murdering St. William, and, for their punishment, sentenced to the flames. Indeed, they deserved death, if they were guilty of that crime; and if no innocent person was involved in the fate of the guilty, they had nothing to complain of, but themselves, and their own cruelty. by Philip.

They were very hardly dealt with at Beziers. On Palm-Sunday, every year, commenced a certain pastime, which amused the people, who were therefore careful to renew it. The rabble flocked out at night, scoured the streets, broke the Jews windows, and stoned all those that fell in their way. The bishop, having often noticed this inhuman proceeding, which was their preparation for the Easter ceremonies, treated with the Jews, and prevailed with them to buy off this insult by paying him a tribute. The treaty is very singular; for the bishop engaged himself, and his successors, to preserve the Jews from insults, from war, and dilapidation, by day and by night, all the time betwixt Palm-Sunday and Easter; declaring that he would shut the doors of the church against all that should break open those of the Jews: and, on their part, he obliged them to pay annually, to the bishop, two hundred sols de meilgeuil, which might amount, at that time, to four marks in silver. They paid, moreover, above four silver marks to the church of St. Nazarus, to purchase ornaments. This treaty was concluded at Beziers, and rendered them pretty easy, till they were expelled under Philip, surnamed Augustus.

This prince, at the beginning of his reign, under pretence of devotion, banished the Jews out of his kingdom, confiscated their estates, and only permitted them to sell their moveables, and carry away the money, which was reducing them to the last extremity; since people, taking advantage of this circumstance, refused to purchase or pay.

Rigord, who wrote the life of Philip, says, that, by this exile, he revenged the death of a young man, named Richard, whom the Jews had crucified at Paris; and that he was convinced, by this example, of what he had often heard the young princes say, that were educated with him, that the Jews every year committed such a murder. This accusation often recurs, and all nations charge this crime upon the Jews, whilst none can conjecture the origin of this imputation. However, Richard was looked upon as a martyr, and was buried in the churchyard of the Little Fields, which still preserves its name.

name. He was afterwards removed to Innocents church; from whence, we are told, the English carried away his body, in Charles V. reign, leaving only his head in the church. This was the ground of the pretence to fall upon the Jews. They were seized in all the synagogues, plundered of every thing that was most valuable, and at length expelled the kingdom.

But Philip did not always remain an enemy to this nation. Whether he had only made the decree of banishment at the solicitation of the cardinal de Champagne, brother to the queen mother, and first minister of state, or was willing to revenge himself on pope Innocent III. for a flagrant indignity offered him, or whether he was sensible that the state suffered much by losing such a multitude of rich merchants and ingenious artists, he recalled them from their banishment. The zealots blamed this recall of the enemies of Christianity, and the people murmured. However, the exiled Jews returned, but for no long continuance.

Those in England, who had been banished out of it ever since the year 1020, had since found means to settle again in that kingdom, and were become so numerous in the reign of Henry II. that, having then but one burying ground in London, they petitioned that monarch to permit them to have some new ones, which were accordingly granted.

But they suffered much under Richard I. because the court and people were prepossessed with a notion, that the Jews were all magicians, and might practice some witchcraft upon the king, if they were present at his coronation. Severe injunctions were given to all the Jews not to appear at it. Some, who came from far and near, at great expence, to see the ceremony, were resolved not to lose their labour or money. They flattered themselves they should not be known, because they were strangers in the city; but they were mistaken. The officers, having discovered some of them at Westminster, fell upon them with staves. They dragged them out of the church half dead: but the noise of this execution being spread in the city, set the people in an uproar, who broke open the houses of the Jews, and killed those they met with. Happy were they that found faithful friends to shelter them. The tumult spread from the capital to the counties, where great numbers were slain. The day after the coronation, orders were given to stop these violent proceedings: but whether they were ill executed, or that it was impossible to put such a sudden check to the fury of the people, the persecution lasted almost all the year, which was that of the jubilee.

A greater calamity still befel them when Richard crusaded. The Jews thought they had purchased this prince's favour, by the great sums they had brought into his treasury to support his expences; but the people resolved to make a general massacre of them. This was performed at Norwich, where they began. Many of them suffered at Stamford and St. Edmund's. The massacre was more terrible at York, where 1500 had seized on the city to defend themselves; but being besieged, they offered to capitulate, and to ransom their lives with money. The offer being refused, one of them cried out, "That it was better to fall by their own hands, than the hands of barbarous assassins." This animating the rest, they became the executioners of their own wives and children, and retiring afterwards to the king's palace, set it on fire, and expired themselves amidst surrounding flames.

Before we close this century, we think to give some account of the most celebrated rabbies who flourished at that period. We begin with the learned rabbi Nathan Ben Jechiel, chief of the Jewish academy at Rome, and author of the book called HARUCK, where he explains all the terms of the Talmud in so copious a manner, that he has, in some measure, exhausted that subject; inasmuch, that those who have come after him, have rather plundered than improved him, particularly the great Buxtorf, who made frequent use of his remarks, without quoting him.

The next in time, though superior in learning and merit, was the great Aben-Ezra, surnamed, by way of excellence, the Wise, as he really was one of the most learned men of his age and nation. He had been a great traveller, and a diligent searcher after learning: was a good astronomer, philosopher, physician, poet, and critic; in which last science he hath excelled all that went before him, and is chiefly admired by the Christians for his judicious explanations of the sacred books.

We have in this century three famous rabbies of the name of Levi. One born at Cologne, who, after many inferences with the Christians, was baptized, and taught Latin, under the name of Herman. 2. Judah Levi, a good poet, and author of the dialogue, entitled, "Chozar." 3. Abraham Levi, a learned rabbi, said to be related to Aben-Ezra, and who was a most zealous antagonist against the Caraites, though far inferior to them in point of reasoning and judgment; so that not being able to cope with them, he had recourse to king Alphonso VII. to whom he had rendered signal services, and obtained an order from him to have all his adversaries silenced.

Decline of the Jewish nation in the east. The Jews persecuted by the caliph. Character of Joseph. Moses Nachmanides. His knowledge. A revolution in Egypt. Two sorts of Mamalukes. Simeon Duran. His works. Establishment of the Moguls in Asia. Interest of the Jews with Arqoun Khan. Revolutions and massacre on the death of that prince and his ministers. Jews peaceable under the Greeks.

WE shall here again be obliged to join the 13th and 14th centuries together, to avoid being frequently forced to break off the thread of their history, and begin with those of the east, where we shall find them strangely dwindled, both in number and figure, especially with respect either to their chiefs, their academics, or learned men.

Petachia, who travelled to all the synagogues of his nation, and whose voyage is paralleled with that of Benjamin his cotemporary, affirms, that he still found a prince of the captivity in the east, when he arrived there. But it is probable the persecution railed at the end of the twelfth or thirteenth century, completed the ruin of the nation in this country. Nasser Ledinillah, one of the Abbassides, was then caliph at Bagdad. His reign lasted forty-seven years, all which time he persecuted the Jews. He was induced by two reasons. One was, that he was very zealous for his religion; for he caused a great number of mosques and places, dedicated to the Mahometan service, to be built in his dominions. The other was an excessive avarice. It is said of him, that seeing a cistern, which he wished to be filled with gold and silver, but which still wanted two fathoms of it, he cried out, "Shall I not live long enough to fill it?" On the contrary, his grandson Moslanger, finding it full, exclaimed, "How happy should I be could I live long enough to empty it!" Both of them lived to see their desires accomplished. Nasser, who designed to fill it, made use of the law of escheat, before unknown, and appropriated the succession of all foreign merchants who died in his dominions. The riches of the Jews drew upon them great extortions from a very covetous prince, and at last an open persecution; for Nasser commanding them all to depart his provinces, or turn Mussulmen, part of them went into exile, and the rest chose to stay upon his terms.

Joseph, the son of Jahia, an able physician, after he had dissembled for some time, also went into banishment. He had studied the mathematics, and discoursed on that science with wonderful facility. He felt the weight of Nasser's persecution; and having sold his estate, through means of dissimulation, retired into Egypt with all he had. He there found Maimonides, and, with his assistance, corrected a treatise on astronomy which he had written. After Maimonides's death, he quitted Egypt, to retire to Aleppo, where he purchased an estate, married, and practised physic, under the protection of Malek Aidaher.

Moses Nachmani-des, his knowledge.

Judæa was much depopulated by the wars which the Saracens and Christians waged there, as well as in Syria. Most of the cities frequently changed masters. Nevertheless, there were still doctors and synagogues in it. For here it was that the famous Moses Nachmanides retired, and built a synagogue. He was born at Gironne, and applied himself to physic; but afterwards made great progress in the study of the law, which has given him the name of the Father of Wisdom, the Luminary and the Flower of the Crown. A sermon, he preached before the king of Castile, obtained him the character of the Father of Eloquence. Ramban (which is the name he commonly goes by) at first despised the caballistical law; but when he had once relished it, he attained to the greatest perfection in it.

We cannot conjecture why Ramban, who enjoyed so great a reputation in his own country, left it to go to Jerusalem; but it is certain he retired thither, built a synagogue, and died there. Authors do not agree about the precise time of his death. He composed a prayer upon the Ruin of the House or Temple; Letters to induce men to Piety, and particularly to recommend the holy state of marriage. He entered deeply into the reigning disputes of that time, concerning Maimonides's sentiments; and made an apology for R. Alphes, which he entitled the Book of Wars. It would be useless to affix a catalogue of his works, which may be seen elsewhere. Baruch Germersheim also quitted his country to effect the reformation of the Spanish synagogues. From thence he went to Candia; and at length sought a retreat in Judæa, where he died.

in Egypt.

The tranquillity of Egypt was no less disturbed than that of the Holy Land. St. Lewis endeavoured to make a conquest of this country: he took Damietta, and defeated Malek Almohadam, who succeeded his father, and then reigned in Egypt; but this caliph won a second battle, in which the king was made prisoner. Almohadam's mother caused him to be killed by Ibek, the leader of the Mamalukes, whom she was disposed to marry. Thus the love or ambition of an unnatural mother threw Egypt into foreign hands. There was no deliberation about the election of St. Lewis; for Ibek, the sultaness's gallant, was proclaimed king, and the mamalukes became masters of this great kingdom.

These mamalukes, so famous at that time, were of different nations: the first were slaves of Great Armenia, or Turcomans, which some Tartars had sold to the Egyptians. The king of Egypt took a thousand of them into his service, and employed them in building a fortress upon the sea-coast; from whence they took the name of Mamalukes Baharia, that is, maritime slaves. These people, accustomed to labour, arrived to the greatest employments, till at length Ibek became king of Egypt. The sultaness having caused him to be slain, Coutus was elected by the mamalukes. He vanquished the Tartars, who had hitherto been thought invincible; but, on chasing a hare, he was killed by Bibars, one of his principal officers, and the greatest man the Turcoman mamalukes ever had. He reigned but seventeen years, but spent them all at the head of his armies, which were generally victorious. Helaun, one of his successors, committed the same fault as the Egyptian sultans; for he brought a number of slaves from Circassia, to whom he entrusted the guard of the towers of Cairo, from whence they took the name of Jorghite Mamalukes, and growing potent and numerous, dethroned the marine mamalukes, and made themselves masters of Egypt.

It is said that these mamalukes received none but Christians among them, whom they caused to abjure their religion; and that all descended from Mahometan or Jewish parents were excluded. If this conjecture were solid, we could not doubt but the Jews were suspected by the governors of Egypt for near three centuries; for they were as much mistrusted as the natural Mahometans. These latter were distrusted because they were thought to be still attached to the house of the caliphs, the descendants of their prophet, who subsisted still in Egypt, but had no authority, and only concerned themselves with the affairs of religion. The Jews had no reason to raise again this decayed house; why then should they be mistrusted, and hindered from entering into the body of the mamalukes, when they renounced their religion? It is, however, true, that the Jews made no great figure in Egypt under their empire, and that they were great gainers by changing their master, as we shall see in the sequel. They preserved their synagogues, but had no share in public transactions. It looks as if they had renounced study, since no learned men appeared among them.

We only find, in the fourteenth century, one Simon Duran in some city of Africa; but he was not originally of this country. He had passed thither from Spain, from whence he had carried the commentary of Alphes, which he had translated. He composed a Chronology of the ancient Rabbins, the Buckler of the Fathers, Diligent Judgment, and the Judgment of Justice; which Buxtorf has con-founded, as if they were but one book, because they are always joined together.

The Tartars, or Moguls, formed a new monarchy in Asia, and immediately seized upon Chorazan. This great revolution was occasioned by one of the most frivolous subjects that could embroil sovereigns. Mohammed, surnamed Chovarezm Shah, reigned in Chorazan, and had obliged all the neighbouring princes to submit to his laws. He had even forced the great Tartars to raise the siege of Samarcand. A numerous caravan of Tartarian merchants arrived at Otrar, a city of the Transoxiana, under the guard of a considerable officer of Ginghizkhan's spies. That which exasperated him was, that, being a Turcoman by birth, he had been brought up in the seraglio with the slaves, and had changed his name to conceal his origin. He wrote to his master, that he must punish all these slaves with death; and as the Persians have a saying, "The wisest are blind, when the decrees of Providence is come," Mohammed, who had so great an interest to live peaceably with the cham of Tartary, ordered the prisoners to be put to death without examination; and would give no satisfaction to Ginghizkhan, who demanded it before he engaged in the war which broke out betwixt these princes. Mohammed lost his courage as soon as he saw the vigorous resistance that was made by a handful of Tartars, who stopped his army in passing the Oxus. He deliberated whether he should pass that moment to the Indies, where he had made great conquests, but changed his design. The Tartars pushed him to such extremities, that he was forced to make his escape to the isles of the Caspian Sea, where he died, and was buried. His mother, whom he had put into an impregnable castle, was obliged to surrender for want of water; but no sooner was she got out, than there fell such a torrent of rain, that the cisterns overflowed. Ginghizkhan sent her home attired in mourning; but the crowd of those, who desired to see her before she went, was so great, that she was stifled for want of guards to disperse them.

The Tartars pushed their conquests much farther, and took Bagdad. Mosthadem, the last caliph of the house of the Abbassides, who then reigned, was a prince of very indifferent intellects, and so devoted to his pleasures, that he could not refrain from them, even when Hagalou, the sultan of the Moguls, invested the city, and pressed him hard by a siege of two months. This prince, being taken, was led through the streets of the city, wrapped up and smothered in a felt, in which he soon expired. One of his sons was taken off as he courageously defended a gate a gate of the city, whilst his father was revelling; and the other was slain by the conqueror. Thus ended the illustrious house of the Abbassides, that had produced thirty-seven caliphs; and the east was subjected to the plunders of the Tartars and Moguls.

As these barbarous nations depopulated all the places they passed through, the settlements which the ten tribes had in this country were destroyed, and the nation again dispersed. However, they devoted themselves to these new matters of Asia, and sometimes found favour at their court. Akmed Khan, surnamed Nicoudar Oglan, after he had usurped his nephew's monarchy, turned Mussulman, and thereby drew upon him his subjects' hatred, who had great inclination for Christianity, and aversion for the Mahometans. Argoun Khan, who impatiently bore his uncle's usurpation, issued out of Chorazan, where he had retired, was defeated, and taken prisoner. This disgrace raised him to the throne; for Lemir Buga, who was ordered to kill him, joined with him, and surprising his uncle's general, and the sultan, who was diverting him at Bagdad, he caused him to be taken off, and ascended his father's throne. Argoun at first gave the government to Buga, who had done him so important a service; but this minister, elated with his grandeur, and unable to bear his exaltation, rebelled, was slain soon after, and a Jewish physician, ingenious and agreeable in conversation, named Saadeddoular, became first minister of the sultan. They do him this justice, that he deprived the Christians of nothing they possessed in Argoun's empire. But he employed all his address to raise his nation, and to procure it new establishments. Thus the Jews of the east began to revive, and to enjoy the advantages they had been so long deprived of.

The Mussulmen with indignation beheld the progress of the dispersed tribes, and the rather because they were kept out of all employments, and shut out of their prince's camp; but they were quickly so-laced by Argoun's sickness, while the Jews prayed in all the provinces for the sultan's health.

Saadeddoular, who foresaw the consequences of this sickness to himself and brethren, sent express orders every where to redress the grievances which were complained of during his ministry, and to appease the people by a speedy satisfaction, but all to no purpose. Argoun died, and, even before his death, the minister of state was accused of having poisoned his master. This accusation, invented by the Arabian historians, seems improbable. Nevertheless, Saadeddoular was taken off; and after the prince's death, which the Mussulmen considered as a very fortunate event, they fell upon the Jews, and made great slaughter of them, to revenge the real or pretended injustices they had done them.

We read likewise, in Aboufaid's life, who was sultan at the beginning of the fourteenth century, that a Jew appeared at his court with a pompous equipage; from whence it is inferred, that, notwithstanding the massacre at Chorazan, after Argoun's death, the Jews had re-established themselves at the court of the Moguls, who became Mussulmen. This monarchy was cantoned into many principalities after Aboufaid's death, which division gave rise to bloody wars, for each endeavoured to encroach upon his neighbour's frontiers, till Tamerlane appeared.

It is probable that the Jews enjoyed tranquillity in the Grecian empire during these two centuries; at least we meet with nothing to the contrary. We learn that they enjoyed full liberty of conscience, since the Greek writers of those times condemned the violence which the Latins exercised against them, in forcing them to be baptized; tho' none were more ready than themselves to judaize. These reproaches were but too well founded, considering the cruel usage the Jews met with from the crusaders, both in the west before they set out, and thro' every place of the east where they arrived.

State of the Jews in the west. Persecuted at Toledo. Massacred by the crusaders. Marriages with foreign women condemned. The prior of the Dominicans attempts their conversion by gentle means. Raymond Martin, a Dominican, produces a composition called "The poniard of Faith." Alphonso X. king of Castile, encourages the Jews. Malonin's stratagem against them. Several learned men at this time. Books of devotion and instruction composed by the rabbies.

THE Jewish nation was numerous and potent in the west, and particularly in Spain, where it maintained its interest equally with the caliphs and Christian princes, because the different exigencies of state rendered them necessary to both. In the mean time their number and authority sometimes excited the jealousy of ecclesiastics, who persecuted them. This happened at the beginning of the thirteenth century at Toledo. The bishop of that great city, piqued to see his diocese filled with multitudes of opulent Jews, and desiring to enrich himself with their spoils, exasperated the people against them. This bishop, who was of a warm and restless temper, interfered in all affairs of peace and war, and nothing considerable was transacted in Spain but what he had a hand in. His merit had raised him to the see of Toledo, notwithstanding his birth; for he was an obscure native of Castile. His diocese became sensible that he was fitter to be a minister of state, or the general of an army, than a bishop. But the Jews suffered more from him than any others; for, putting himself at the head of a rabble which he had raised, he tumultuously entered their synagogue, dispersed the assembly, and thence proceeded to plunder their houses. He endeavoured to justify his rapacity, by accusing the Jews of having betrayed the city when the Moors besieged it: but it is not probable the besieged would quit the city to go in procession a league from it, or that they would have given up the custody of it. Besides, the capitulation of the inhabitants is their apology; for they were permitted to quit the country, and carry off their effects. They were allowed seven churches, upon condition of paying the imposts that had been paid to the Goths; and the Jews, who were included in the treaty, had liberty of conscience.

This disaster was followed by another; for the crusaders, who were preparing for their expedition to the Holy Land, having their rendezvous near this great city, completed what that prelate had begun, from a notion that the destruction of these enemies to Christianity would undoubtedly obtain a blessing on their enterprise; so that these votaries prescribed no bounds to their cruelty. Abravanel looks upon this persecution as one of the four severest that his nation suffered; for, according to his account, a greater number of Jews went out of Spain than Moses brought out of Egypt. The nobility of Spain withstood the torrent of these cruelties, and repressed them by their authority and resistance. But king Ferdinand, who endeavoured to win the love of his people, by persecuting the Albigenses and other heretics, and who himself set fire to the pile on which they were burned, to shew the ardour of his zeal, could not be favourable to the Jews, the most odious of all.

They ought, according to their principles, to blame themselves for their calamities, and to consider themselves as the principal causes of them; for, by their own confession, they were fallen into two trying sins. There was some variation in their tephelim. Their superstitious partiality for these phylacteries of the head and hand, was notorious in very early times, but it increased in the following ages. Even the points and ornaments of their letters were a subject of scruple and controversy betwixt betwixt the German and Portuguese synagogues; and the Spaniards, differing upon this matter, raised commotions in the beginning of the thirteenth century; for R. Baruch made a journey from Germany to Spain, to reproach them with the novelties which they introduced into their synagogues.

Marriages with foreign women condemned.

In Spain they were guilty of a more palpable misdemeanor, for they no longer scrupled to marry strange women. As marriages with Christians had been severely forbidden, it is probable they contracted oftener with the Saracens' daughters. Moses de Cozzi reprobated these marriages. He was of an Italian family, and therefore retained the name of the town of Cozzi, in the Milanese, whence he came; but he was born in Spain, and deemed the most learned rabbi in his time. He was averse to these heterogeneous marriages. He preached often upon this subject, and, at last, had the good fortune to be heard; for many sent away the strange wives they had married. There were near 12000 Jews in the city of Toledo.

The prior of the Dominicans attempts their conversion by gentle means.

Raymond de Pennafort, prior of the Dominicans, had already condemned the violence that had been too often employed to destroy rather than convert the Jews, and recommended gentle instruction. As he had great credit with James I. king of Arragon, whose confessor he was, and often minister to the pope, he persuaded this prince, that he ought to repress the insolence of the people, to oblige many to the study of Arabic and Hebrew, to qualify them to dispute with Jews and Saracens, and to lead them to Christianity, by convincing them of their errors. They boast much of the success he had with the Saracens, and affirm, that he converted above ten thousand of them; and that the Moors of Africa had a sincere desire to do the same thing; but they do not so confidently speak of the conversion of the Jews. It is only observed, that they entertained great respect for his person, as an acknowledgment of his gentle and equitable way of dealing with them. King James of Arragon, at his request, published divers edicts; and though they were not so rigid as others had been, yet they infringed upon their ancient liberty.

Raymond Martin, a Dominican, composes a prediction, called, "The Poinard of Faith."

The exertion of this Dominican produced the Pugio Fidei, or Poinard of Faith. This book is sometimes ascribed to him, as if he was the author; but he was only the promoter of it; nor did it appear till three years after his death, composed by Raymond Martin, a man of the same order. It has been supposed that he was born a Jew, and that he turned monk after his conversion; but Nachmanides does not upbraid him with being an apostate from Judaism, though this violent and passionate rabbi spared not the grossest abuses. He had been selected to study the languages, to be employed in the conversion of the Jews; bore some part at the conference held at Barcelona, in the palace of king James, and, in his presence, against Moses Nachmanides, the famous casuist before-mentioned. We are told that Raymond so confounded his adversary, that he was obliged to quit Spain, and retire to Jerusalem, to avoid the shame and reproach that he would have incurred.

Alphonso encourages the Jews.

About the same time Alphonso X. king of Castile, employed another rabbi, Isaac, the son of Sid, who made the astronomical tables, which have since been called the Alphonfine, and held in great esteem by all the learned, who have applied themselves to that study. Moses, the son of Tibbon, who then lived in the kingdom of Granada, translated all Euclid's elements, whose manuscript is still at Rome. It is said he taught at Montpellier when he composed this work.

Malicious stratagem against the Jews.

Alphonso likewise made use of them in other cases; and proving so generous a patron, it excited the jealousy of the zealots, and put them upon devising new plots and accusations against them; and it was probably about this time that three villains, of the city of Oriena, in Andalusia, threw a dead body into the house of a Jew, and accused him of murder. This calumny being spread through the city, the people massacred all the Jews that fell into their hands. Some of them escaped into their friends houses; but it being the feast of unleavened bread, and there being none of it to be met with, they were very near dying with hunger, as chusing rather to fast than break the law. The inhabitants of Palma imitated the Orienians in slaughtering the Jews, who solicited their brethren to send a deputation to the court, to put a stop to a massacre that was like to become universal. The persecutors followed the three Jews, that were deputed, very closely, and arrived even before them; because these envoys had been obliged to leave the road, and abscond in a forest, for fear of falling into their persecutors hands. Joseph, the head of the embassy, pleaded with so much eloquence, that he was admired by all the court. The king acquitted the nation of the pretended murder; but, nevertheless, rebuked them for their excessive usuries, the sumptuousness of their dress, and the pomp wherewith these fugitives walked the streets, to the provoking jealousy of his subjects. He asked them why they taught to sing, since they ought to be in mourning? Why they instructed their children to fence, since they never went to war? The Jews excused themselves, by saying, that their nation had a mixture of bad and good men, like the Christians; and that the king had only condemned the magnificence of habits in the Jews, without mentioning their women, which occasioned them to think the edict did not relate to them.

The countenance and protection of Alphonso produced many learned men, besides those already mentioned, and, amongst the rest, the famous Meir Mithridos, as he is called by Gantz; though he was the son of Theodorus, prince of the Levites at Burgos. He ought not to be confounded, as is commonly done, with another Meir of Narbonne, his cotemporary, and who had, like him, a great many disciples.

This rabbi, a native of Toledo, was a great casuist. He gave his principal piece the title, "Before and Behind, or before the Faces," to shew that he penetrated to the bottom of the most subtle arguments, and had studied all sides of a question. He wrote also a volume of letters against Nachmanides, and trained up disciples that maintained their nation's and their master's honour.

Nor was it only at the court of Castile that the learned rabbies appeared, and were respected. James I. king of Arragon, respected them so highly as to receive moral lectures from them. He desired of them the books of devotion and piety they had composed. R. Jona, who lived at that time, wrote to another Jona, of Gironne, for advice, how he ought to act with the king of Arragon's injunctions, who had commanded him to write a book, to instruct man in the duties of religion and piety. It is believed likewise, that it is to this Jona we ought to ascribe the honour of a famous book concerning fear, which is attributed to the other Jona, and has been translated into several languages. The rabbies, upon the whole, must have been in great favour with this prince, since he had recourse to them to be instructed in the rules of true piety.

Massacre of the Jews in Languedoc. They are exposed to fresh outrages. Massacre of them in Toledo. Mebir, a Jew physician, put to the torture for poisoning the king. Jews persecuted by Henry III. Oppressed in Arragon. Learned men.

THE grossest outrages were committed on the Jews in Languedoc by the rabble, who were instigated to it by the monks. Nothing could resist the torrent which overflowed on all sides, and made horrible havock wherever it came. They particularly attacked the Jews, to enrich themselves with their spoils; yet the Christians were not secure, because the smallest pretence was a sufficient motive for pillaging their houses. Application was made to the pope, who resided at Avignon; but the people despised despised his excommunications and anathemas. The count de Tolouse executed the laws and justice upon them. He seized some of them, and made them prisoners; but the people opened the prisons, and the monks broke their chains. The count was willing to save some Jews; but the man, to whom he had entrusted their custody, delivered them to their enemies; and he had the mortification to see them come into his city to force the remainder of that nation to turn Christians. They submitted to it to avoid death. The massacre continued at Bourdeaux, Agen, Castel-Sarasin, and other cities. Those who were retired to Narbonne, imagining the storm was over, came out of their retreat; but they found in the way a troop of ruffians, who, supported by the peasants, put them to the sword. The king of France, tired with so many cruelties, ordered them to be prosecuted without quarter. The nobility armed by the king's order, and obliged them to retire into Navarre and Arragon. They carried the same disposition thither, and caused the same disorders. The king of Arragon armed against them, put prince Alphonso at the head of his army, who caused the leader of the ruffians to be killed by his master of the horse, and dispersed the rest. Part of them perished by the sword, and the rest by pestilence.

The plague was a fresh spring of misery to the Jews, who were supposed to be the cause of it. They were accused of conspiring with the peasants of Mesura, to poison the waters of the river, and of furnishing them with the ingredients. They were cast into prisons, and informations were lodged against them. Their innocence was proved; but the king, who was unwilling to acknowledge the injustice he had committed, in retaining such vast numbers of prisoners so long upon a false pretence, declared that he had shut them up only to convert them; and upon their refusal to embrace Christianity, fifteen thousand of them were sentenced to the fire and burnt.

Alphonso the Eleventh, their friend and protector, though wholly guided by one Joseph of Astigi, then intendant of his finances, was prevailed upon, nevertheless, by his mutinous subjects, to issue out an edict against them, on account of an indignity pretended to have been offered by a Jewish boy to the apparatus of a sacred ordinance, as it was carried through the streets. A council was called that very night, to deliberate whether they should be massacred or banished, when the advice for banishment prevailed. Happily for them the prince-royal obtained a revision of the process, by which it was found that it was a young Christian, whose curiosity had brought him to the window to see the procession, and had by chance overset a vessel of water upon the chalice. The king, upon this, revoked his edict, to the mortification of the zealots, who gave out that the Christian had been suborned to make a deposition in favour of their enemies. This, however, did not hinder the populace from falling upon the Jews in another city, where they massacred them upon the same pretence, and might have gone a much greater length, had not the king caused ten of the mutinous ringleaders to be hanged.

No sooner had they escaped this danger, than they fell into another, much more dreadful. There was a mutiny against them at Toledo. R. Ascher, having fled some time before from his native place Northembourg, retired to Toledo with his eight sons. One of his children, seeing an assassin breaking open his house in order to murder him, fell into such an excess of rage, as to kill all his relations that were shut up with him. He stabbed his own wife, and that of his brother Jacob, a man remarkable not only for his disinterestedness, while he lived, as teaching always gratis, though he was poor, but for leaving behind a famous book, intitled Turim, which is a body of civil and ecclesiastical law. This Jew, having killed all his relations, dispatched himself, for fear of falling into the hands of the Nazarenes. Some place this persecution in the year 1340; but others date it nine years later, and with reason, not only because in the year 1340, R. Jacob composed the book before mentioned, but Alphonso XI. who had countenanced the nation from the beginning of his reign, was living in 1349. At his death he tolerated a sedition which he could not suppress. Peter the Cruel, his son, who came to the throne in the year 1350, saw several factions formed in his kingdom, either by the insolence of the people, or the great, who usurped part of his authority, and caused most violent commotions. Henry de Tristemare, his natural brother, supported by Bertrand de Guelclin took Toledo, killed him, and came before Burgos, which still resisted. The Jews fortified themselves in their quarter, and refused to surrender to the conqueror. Peter, they alledged, was their lawful king; and that they would rather lose their lives, than receive another master, who was not the heir of his house. Henry could not forbear esteeming their fidelity for a deceased king, and therefore granted them honourable conditions when they engaged on his side.

Tristemare, at his accession to the crown, made Don Mehir his physician; but dying soon after, not without suspicion of having been poisoned, Mehir was put to the torture, and confessed that he had killed the king. Other Spanish authors, however, as Gusman and Mariana, think he was rather poisoned by a Moor, whom the king of Granada had sent thither for that purpose. But as his death was occasioned by a weakness in his nerves, there is no great probability that he was poisoned, especially by his physician, to whom he had been so good a friend.

The Jews were not treated more favourably at the end of this century than they had been at the beginning. They complained that the monks, who were willing to make themselves favourites at court, or with the people, from a principle of zeal, affected to appear their irreconcilable enemies. One of them obtained an order, by the queen's means, to banish them all from Spain. But this princeling, being advised not to cut down, or pluck up, a vine that bore good fruit, was appeased by a sum of fifty thousand gold crowns. They suffered much more under the reign of Henry III. king of Castile, who was but fourteen years old when he came to the throne. Martin, archdeacon of Astigi, preaching in the streets of Seville and Corduba, so inflamed the minds of the people against the Jews, as to cause them to massacre them. The same flew to Toledo, Valencia, and Barcelona, where some were plundered, and others killed, whilst the more politic changed their religion, to escape the fury of the rabble. The synagogues of Seville and Corduba, which were so numerous, were dispersed by the multitude of deserters. Henry pursued them. Those that retired to Andalusia, and other places, were murdered by the inhabitants.

His son John was as inhuman as himself. Those who concealed themselves in the father's reign, perished miserably in the son's, because they were denied all the necessaries of life, and were easily distinguished by a red badge, which they were forced to wear.

Nor were they more happy in Arragon, for the states being assembled to prevent the consequences of a war, that seemed inevitable, they resolved to raise new taxes upon the Moors and Jews, to supply the exigencies of state, whilst the nobility took up arms; and these imports subjected them to continual vexations and prosecutions, which reduced them to the lowest degree of misery.

However, this century was not without its great men, among whom we must reckon one Salomon, son of Chanor, who went from Constantinople to Burgos, to reveal the Profundities of the Law. This was the title of a book in which he explained the difficult passages of the Pentateuch, and the interpretations of the rabbies, that were too metaphorical or hyperbolical.

His son Schem Tou lived in the year 1375, and translated St. Matthew's gospel into Hebrew. He also published his Paradise, in which he maintains, that that most of the Talmudic stories ought to be interpreted allegorically.

Zerechias the younger also lived at that time, who must not be mistaken for another of the same name, who lived in the twelfth century, and passes for a Spaniard; though he was born at Lunel, in Languedoc, because this province then depended upon Spain.

The king of Castile had two Jewish physicians in his suite: the latter, called Meir Algudes, was at the same time intendant or head of all the Spanish synagogues. He translated Aristotle's ethics. This philosopher's works were so esteemed by the rabbies, that Schem Tou, another learned man, inserted them in his Excellency of the Law. This mark of esteem is the more extraordinary, because the doctors hardly ever read the works of foreigners, which they generally despised.

The Jews favoured by the popes. Reason of the conduct of the popes. Conduct of pope Gregory IX. He prevents a general massacre of the Jews in France. A persecution at Trani. Jews protected and instructed by Clement V. Particularly favoured by Clement VI. Become powerful at Bologna.

The Jews favoured by the popes.

Reason of the conduct of the popes.

Of all sovereigns, hardly one is to be found whose authority has been more indulgent to the Jews than that of the popes; who, whilst they persecuted Christians not subject to their laws, countenanced this nation, out of which they chose intendants of their finances. They granted them privileges, and left them full liberty of conscience. Some popes, indeed, have been their enemies: it is impossible that, in so long a succession of Roman bishops, they should all have been of the same constitution, and followed the same principles. They still lived more quietly under the dominion of the heads of the church than any where else: and it is easy to assign the reasons of the popes conduct towards the Jews, whilst they maintained a quite opposite one towards the Christians.

The popes had not so much spleen against the Jews, because they had not sufficient power to give them umbrage. The Protestants opposed the pontifical authority, and endeavoured to resume the privileges that belonged to them; and therefore the popes have made constant efforts to weaken and destroy them. Besides, the Jews have no particular grudge to the popes, as all Christians to them are upon a level. The desire of revenge, and the glory of destroying rivals, have no place here: instead of gaining by their destruction, the respect to their revenues interests them in their preservation.

Conduct of pope Gregory IX.

Gregory IX. nephew to Innocent III. was one of the most zealous pontiffs. He was for having all princes leave their kingdoms, to make the conquest of the Holy Land from the infidels. He had the pleasure to see the isles of Minorca and Majorca, that were full of Mussulmen, return into Christian hands, after Ferdinand had destroyed the fleet of the Moors. It is said too, that all the inhabitants of these two isles turned Christians. Though he had a misunderstanding with Frederick the emperor, yet he scrupled not to write to him, to let him know, that he might deliver the incredulous Jews to the secular arm to be punished; in which he departed from his uncle's conduct, who preserved them in their ancient privileges. But he himself altered his opinion; for, being informed that the Jews were massacred in several places, when the expedition was on foot for the Holy Land, he prevented these barbarous executions.

He also delivered them from another persecution they fell into, under pretence that they used human blood in their medicines. The inhabitants of Haguenuau accused the Jews, their fellow-citizens, of stealing some children from the Christians, and murdering them in a mill, in order to use their blood in some of their remedies. The imposture was gross; and the emperor, who nicely investigated the matter, was convinced of their innocence. The like fury prevailed in Spain. The English Jews would have been treated with the same inhumanity, had they not warded off the danger, by buying the minister's and the king's favour. They were killed and persecuted in several places: but the greatest massacre was at Paris. It had lasted longer, if pope Gregory IX. who had then the see, had not written pressing to Lewis, to stop the course of these cruelties, and not to force the consciences of the Jews: and thus they were indebted for their lives to the pope's toleration, not only in his diocese, but also in France.

He prevents a general massacre of the Jews in France.

They were severely treated in Trani, where a popular tumult was raised upon vain pretences. They were grown potent in these two cities, and also in the whole kingdom of Naples, where they had numerous synagogues and learned rabbies. They compare the poets of this country with those of Provence, who were then in so great reputation. The king openly protected them, because they had done him essential services in his wars. He gave them a recommendation when he died; but it was thought they could not have a greater service done them, than by converting them to Christianity. To evade the persecution, they promised to change their religion, upon condition they might take wives from good houses, and the noble families of Naples. Every body was deceived in this contract, except the ecclesiastics. The Jews were surprized to see these conditions granted. In the mean time there was no retracting, and they must turn Christians. It was no less surprize to others, to see several marriages made up by means of so recent and suspected a conversion. Those that found not a match returned to their old religion. A monk of Trani, in order to be revenged on the Jews, accused one of them with offering an indignity to the rites of the Christian religion. This incited the common people, who mutinied, and massacred all they met with. The tumult proceeded from Trani to Naples, where the Jews would have been all murdered, if some men of power had not concealed the richest of them, and screened them from the popular fury. The Jews would have been to blame if they had accused the pope of all these commotions, as he had no hand in them; for Alexander IV. sent Octavius to Naples, to restore the Guelfs, and to enforce his authority. But Octavius could not succeed, and the pope died soon after the ill success of his negotiation. So that he could neither cause or remedy the miseries the Jews suffered.

A persecution at Trani.

They were more at rest in Ancona. This territory was not in the ecclesiastical state, since pope Clement VII. did not seize it with his troops till the year 1532, upon pretence of defending it against the Turks.

Clement V. who removed his see to Avignon, because of the troubles Italy was disturbed with at the beginning of the fourteenth century, protected them there against the fury of their enemies.

Jews protected and instructed by Clement V.

This pontiff, who endeavoured to secure them from violence, took also care of their instruction: for he appointed professors in all universities, to teach Hebrew, and train up scholars to dispute with and instruct them, after they had learned their language and rites, and the necessary arguments to convince them.

Clement VI. succoured them in a signal manner. The persecution they suffered was commonly a fury, that breaking out at one end of a kingdom, not only inflamed the adjacent provinces, but the neighbouring states. The pretence for this, which was almost universal, was the poisoning fountains and rivers to destroy all those that drank of them. Such as soberly examine the matter, acknowledge, that it is impossible thus to poison rivers. Many people, however, died this year; and the Jews were thought guilty of the mortality. They were massacred in Spain and Germany, where the mischief began.

Particularly favoured by Clement VI.

Twelve thousand of them perished in Bavaria. The imperial cities made bridges with the ruins of the houses of the Jews they pulled down, which consequently must have been in great numbers. Some, reduced to despair, suffered themselves to be crushed under their battered houses; and others burnt themselves, to avoid falling into the hands of their persecutors. Clement VI. in the midst of all their disasters, received them at Avignon, whilst they were burnt in other places, and did all that lay in his power to stop the torrent of this excessive fury.

The Jews were then potent at Bologna; for, besides the synagogue they already had, they built another, larger and finer, and also set up an academy there. It was one of the Hannaarim, who removing from Rome to Bologna, that made this new settlement. This family, which bears the name of Children, is still illustrious, and pretended to be so at that time, since Moses, the head of it, traced his genealogy as high as those Jews whom Titus carried to Rome. They lived in this great city till the end of the fourteenth century, and then made choice of Bologna, where they made great improvements, and built the finest synagogue in Italy.

C H A P. XIII.

Edict of Philip the August against usury. The Jews expelled Britany. Decrees of the council of Lyons. Of the council of Vienna. Jews persecuted under St. Lewis. Recalled. Banished Gascony by Edward I. By Philip the Fair. Recalled. Persecuted afresh in Languedoc. Banished for ever out of France. Obtain privileges at Metz.

PHILIP the August still reigned at the beginning of the thirteenth century, and many petitions were presented to him against the usury of the Jews, who, not content with their excessive interests, and the mortgages of the church-plate, made their debtors slaves. The princes connived at these extortions, because the usurers bought their protection; and because, upon the people's complaints, they were condemned to great fines, and the confiscation of their estates to the royal treasury.

The king, however, was so often importuned by the remonstrances of the people, that he issued several decrees, forbidding the lending money to a monk, unless he could produce the letters-patent of his chapter; the taking in pledge the ornaments of the church; and the necessary tools of workmen. The soldier had liberty to pledge his house; but the husbandman and carpenter, who lived by their labour, were prohibited borrowing of a Jew, upon pain of losing the debt. The edict was still severer in Normandy, where there were Jews as in other places; for the creditors were obliged to cite the borrowers before the bailiff, and the debts were invalid that were not registered in his presence.

These remedies did not cure the evil, as we find afterwards many regulations upon the same subject. It was debated in the assembly of Melun, convened by St. Lewis at the beginning of his reign, when it was forbidden to borrow of the Jews, or take up money at interest from them, to deprive them of all pretences of violence and injustice. But among all the laws, the statute of the duke of Britany, in the year 1239, is the most remarkable.

The Jews dispersed in this province were very numerous, and, being for the most part usurers, impoverished the people. The merchants and nobility complained of it. John Rufus was then duke of Britany, his father Mauclerc having laid down the government. This prince assembled the states, by which it was enacted, at the request of the bishops, abbots, barons, and vassals of Britany, that all the Jews should be banished out of this province for ever.

The debtors of the Jews were discharged from the debts they had contracted with them; and those that had received pledges from them were allowed to keep them.

All that killed a Jew were declared innocent; and the judges were forbidden to take an information against them, or to bring them to trial.

It was resolved to address the king of France to cause this statute to be executed in his dominions, that is, to expel the Jews, to strip them of their fortunes, and give license to kill them.

The duke of Britany engaged for himself and his posterity, for the present and future, "to maintain the said ordinance; and in case of its violation, the bishops had not only power to excommunicate him, but to confiscate his lands in their dioceses, without any respect to the privileges he had obtained, or might obtain for the future."

Lastly, he declared, "that not one of his vassals in Britany should be admitted to do homage, till he had taken oath before two bishops, or two barons, to observe this law, and not to suffer any Jew upon his territories."

The great council of Lyons, in which the emperor was excommunicated, made two new decrees. By one, princes, who had Jewish subjects, were commanded to oblige them to return to the crusaders all the money they had extorted from them, upon pain of excommunication to some; and others were deprived of the privileges of civil society. By the second, the Jews were inhibited from demanding their debts of the crusaders till their return, or till they had received an authentic certificate of their death. The council of Vienna also, called in the same century, was obliged to maintain the Christians against the oppressions they suffered by the usury of the Jews.

Notwithstanding all these decrees and precautions, the Jews still found means to maintain their influence, inasmuch that, in some provinces of France, particularly in Languedoc, they had the privilege of being raised to the magistracy, and, in most places of the kingdom, to have Christian slaves; a circumstance which was attended with very great inconvenience, and often with enormous abuses.

Saint Lewis, zealous for his own religion, persecuted all others. The inquisition, encouraged by his orders, exercised its utmost cruelty upon those they called heretics. In fine, this prince, infatuated with the crusades, permitted those that engaged in the holy league to commit several outrages. In his reign the people rose at Paris against the Jews, under pretence that they sacrificed children on Good Friday, and had occasion for Christian blood that day. Many of them were massacred. The same fury raged in the provinces of Brie, Touraine, Anjou, Poitou, and Maine, where about 2500 persons suffered violent deaths, who refused to abjure their religion. Things at length proceeded so far, that the pope was obliged to write to the king, desiring him to moderate his rage, and informing him, that the Jews ought to be allowed to follow the dictates of their consciences.

During this prince's unfortunate imprisonment in the Holy Land, a prodigious body of his subjects confederated together to go and rescue him. They were headed by one James of Hungary, a Mahometan, and afterwards an apostate from the Cistercian order, who, at the head of this multitude, marched to Orleans, where he massacred all the priests and monks he met with. Departing thence, he pursued his road to Bourges, where he caused all the Jews' books to be seized, in order to be burnt, and plundered them wherever he could. But at length the people rising against these plunderers, in their turn, made great slaughter of them, in which they lost their leader, with many others.

We are told of a conference between R. Jechiel, a learned Jew and great casuist, and Nicholas Dominim, a famed convert from Judaism, before queen Blanche, then regent of the kingdom, and a private encourager of this new crusade. The Christians and Jews expelled Britany.

Jews give us different accounts of the success of it; but that St. Lewis was no friend to the Jews plainly appears from the edict which he sent, whilst under his confinement, to have them banished out of France, which was punctually executed. The Jews, however, pretend that it was the king himself that banished them after his return.

Philip the Bold recalled them, urged, as it is said, by the necessity of his affairs; for the imprisonment and schemes of Lewis had exhausted the finances of the kingdom; and the wars which Philip was obliged to sustain accomplished his ruin. It was thought, therefore, they could not better re-establish the revenues, than by recalling a people that brought treasures along with them, together with the art of making money circulate. Philip's natural lenity contributed much to this recall: however, they were expelled under Philip the Fair.

The Spaniards claimed Levi, the son of Gersom, grandson of Nachmanides by his daughter, as one of those doctors that do their country honour; tho' he was born in Provence, and was therefore a Frenchman, if we consider the provinces that at present compose that monarchy, and have always been a part of Gaul. This rabbi maintained peculiar principles of his own, and was totally averse to every thought that tended to countenance the supposition of apparitions. He lived till the fourteenth century, in which he composed his commentary upon Samuel, and many other works; and was a witness to part of the miseries that ruined his nation in France.

Levi Ben. Gersom a learned rabbi.

Gascony had likewise a great number of Jews, who had gained such an ascendant there, that complaint was made to Edward I. then in possession of it, by an English knight, who, having mortgaged some lands to one of them, and summoned him before a judge, refused to appear or release the mortgage. The king gave the Jew to understand that he must comply, and that, though he had suffered them to enjoy all the privileges which his father had granted to them, he would himself be judge, and shew that he did not design to give them the preference over the Christians; upon which the Jew submitted to the law. But the king having soon after escaped being killed by a clap of thunder, which passed over his bed, and killed two of his officers in the same chamber, thereupon banished them out of Gascony, and all his other dominions in France. There had, by this time, crept such abominable abuses, both amongst the Jews and Christians, in all those Gallic parts, that pope Nicholas IV. sent orders to all his inquisitors there to be more watchful over their conduct; and they executed his commands with great punctuality.

Jews in Gascony banished by Edward I.

His example was not long after followed by Philip the Fair, who wholly banished them out of his dominions. It is said that he did a good deed from an evil principle, the desire of plundering and becoming rich. The king was covetous, and so violently oppressed his people, that the Parisians rebelled and besieged him in the temple, where he remained whole day without food, the besiegers having engrossed whatever was valuable in the synagogues. He banished all the Jews, upon pain of death or conversion, and confiscated the estates of the exiles to his own use, permitting them only to carry their cloaths and a sum of money out of the kingdom. Part of them died by the way with fatigue and hunger: the rest retired into Germany, from whence the Jews of that country look upon themselves as originally of France, descended from these persecuted people.

By Philip the Fair.

Some turned Christians, to prevent the misery they thought unavoidable in foreign countries; and, amongst the rest, Nicholas de Lyra, who wrote more learnedly and strongly against the Jews than any either before or after him.

But most of the rest relapsed into the Judaism they had abjured; and four years after one of these proselytes was burnt at Paris the same day with Margaret of Hainault.

That avarice and interest which had expelled the Jews out of France, caused them to be recalled again eight years after. Lewis Hutin, or the Mutineer, (for these two words signify the same thing,) succeeding his father, and seeing great disorder in his finances, the kingdom exhausted of money, the people ready to mutiny, remembering the oppressions they had suffered in the preceding reign, was not contented with sacrificing Enguerrand d'Angoulême, his father's favourite, to their resentment, but as this execution did not remedy the mischief, he demanded a large sum of money of the fugitive Jews, and upon that condition recalled them to his dominions, where they lived peaceably in his reign, which, to their misfortune, was very short, and they were again exposed to new troubles.

In the year 1320 they underwent a second persecution. This misfortune was no sooner over than they fell into another. Historians relate, that the Saracen king of Granada, mortified to find himself so often overcome by the Christians, sought an expedient to be rid of them otherways than by arms. He called the Jews of his kingdom, and asked them, whether there was no way to poison all the Christians? They undertook this commission; but thinking they could not execute it themselves, as they were too much suspected, they corrupted some lepers, and communicated their design to them, which was to poison the wells and fountains. These lepers being bribed, and farther hoping to enrich themselves with the spoils of the dead, assembled in four general councils, and formed their project all together. The waters were found poisoned in France and Germany. A leading man of Pernay sent to the king the deputation of a leper, whom he had seized in his territories, and who confessed he had been corrupted by a rich Jew, that gave him a receipt, which being dried, put in a bag, and thrown into a well, immediately rendered all the water baneful. The lepers were tried; some were shut up in prisons, and others in their pest-houses, and prohibited to go out. The people of Languedoc, without waiting for the necessary formalities of law, massacred them in such a barbarous manner as cannot be read without horror; while the pretended criminals marched to the flames, and other cruel executions, with as much joy as if they had been going to the celebration of a festival. At Paris they had more equity shewn them, for none but those who appeared guilty were put to death. Some were banished, and others kept prisoners till they had discovered their treasures, which king Philip the Long seized, and thereby raised a considerable sum. Some historians, however, affirm, that they were all expelled out of the kingdom.

Persecuted again in Languedoc.

The exigencies of the state obliged Charles, dauphin of Vienne, and duke of Normandy, to recall them during the disorders caused by the imprisonment of his father in England, by the oppression of the great men, and the mutinies of the people, who were weary of their tedious tyranny. When he came to be king, he confirmed what he had done as dauphin, obliging only the Jews of his kingdom to wear a badge of distinction.

Recalled.

Their last calamity happened in the reign of Charles VI. This prince, being disordered in his senses, or, some affirm, bewitched, the Jews were accused of committing some murders and other outrages, for which some of them were hanged, others scourged, and the synagogues fined, severities which obliged many of them to turn Christians. At length appeared the edict which for ever banished their whole nation from the French dominions, and it is from that sad epocha that they begin the date of their years.

Expelled forever from France.

They have been tolerated in France, though they have not an entire liberty. Profanus, the celebrated astronomer, taught at Montpellier in the middle of the fifteenth century. Mary de Medicis not only sent for Montalto to Paris, to be her physician, but obtained of Henry IV. an absolute liberty of conscience for him and all his family. There were Jews afterwards in Gascony, and from thence came Isaac Castro

Castro de Tartas, who being taken at Brasil by the Portuguese, was put into the inquisition, and burnt alive. But if the Jews have lived in France, it was only by way of toleration, without public authority. Most dissembled, and feigned the profession of a religion they abhorred. There are still in that kingdom some of these disguised Jews, who have entered into public offices in the church, to screen themselves from the royal authority, which persecutes them with the greatest severity even into their retreats.

We must, however, except the city of Metz in Lorrain, in which they preserved their ancient privileges and synagogue. This was afterwards confirmed to them by Lewis XIII. and an edict passed in their favour, by which all criminal causes relating to them were to be referred to the council, and their ancient privileges confirmed; which edict, given at St. Germain's, bears date 1670.

Oppressions of king John. Jews under Henry III. Crusades dangerous. Jews purchase an indemnity. Heavy taxes imposed on them. Henry deceives the crusaders. Jews disposed to quit England. They are sold to Richard, brother of Henry. Accusations preferred against them at Lincoln. A party in England withstand the king's oppression. The Jews synagogue seized. Their expulsion by king Edward.

WE read of nothing worth mentioning concerning the Jews in England till the time of king John, except that they were invited into this kingdom by William the Conqueror. Even so early as the reign of king Stephen, anno 1145, they were accused of crucifying a young Christian in contempt of that religion, and were accordingly punished for it. They were again prosecuted for the same atrocious act in Gloucester, in the reign of Henry II. anno 1181; but some have supposed, and not without probability, that these accusations were feigned, in order to oppress and fleece the individuals of that nation.

King John reigned with severity, used his subjects ill, and incurred the displeasure of the court of Rome by his oppressing the archbishop of Canterbury; which obliged the pope to interdict his kingdom. The Jews he loaded with heavy taxes; and when they began to refuse him money, made them prisoners, and extorted, by violent punishments, what he could not obtain by his edicts. Not satisfied with these extortions, he confiscated the estates of all the Jews of his kingdom, and banished them by proclamation.

The English rebelled against king John, and invited a foreigner to reign in his stead; but his death put a stop to the calamities that threatened the kingdom. The barons joined with young Henry III. raised an army, and gave battle to Lewis of France, who, with difficulty, had much ado to repass the sea, after he had given up all that he had taken. Henry reigned fifty-six years, during which long term the Jews had several turns of fortune.

Henry III. proposed to convert the Jews of his kingdom, which he thought he could not more effectually promote than by founding a seminary for the maintenance of converts. He committed the conduct of it to an ingenious man, who carried on the design with great assiduity. All that were willing to be converted had here a safe retreat, where they lived in peace, without being subject to servile labour or usury. There were many induced by idleness, and the temptation of being maintained without pain or labour, to come into it; so that the number of the converts multiplied, and the house continued a long time.

The Jews of Norwich were accused, some time after, of taking away a Christian child, of having kept it for a year, and after they had circumcised him, designing to crucify him at the feast of the passover. But the design being discovered, the crime passed not unpunished.

The same accusation was brought against those of London four years after, with some remarkable circumstances. The child having been sold to them by his parents and crucified, and the facts discovered by some marvellous circumstances not worth mentioning, he was canonized for a martyr, and his relics carefully preserved. However, the murderers could not be found out, only some Jews, having left London about that time, were shrewdly suspected.

All the Jews were alarmed the year following, from the persecutions of the crusaders in Spain, France, and Germany: fearing, therefore, that this storm would fly over the sea, and fall upon them, they prevented it, and purchased an edict of the king, prohibiting any harm to be done them throughout his dominions.

Through misfortune, the king having frequent occasions for money, Galfrid, his prime minister, thought it could not be easier found than among the Jews. Upon their refusal, therefore, to pay the great sums he demanded, they were accused of committing a murder at London; numbers were imprisoned; and, after many vexatious sufferings, obliged to pay a third of all their estates.

Nor did this suffice for their entire security, for four years after this insatiable prince demanded new presents from his subjects. He rejected those which the abbots and priors brought, when they were not deemed considerable enough, and demanded greater. The Jews were not spared in his demands. He received himself the gold that was presented, and made his officers receive the silver. One particular Jew, called Aaron, was obliged to pay him four hundred gold marks, and his officers four thousand marks of silver. This same Aaron was taxed, seven years after, ten thousand marks of gold, and fourteen thousand marks of silver, to gratify the queen, and obtain his release out of prison. The rest of the Jews were not more happy: they were accused of coining, and counterfeiting the prince's seal; and, under these pretences, they loaded them with imposts. They had their exchequer, and particular judge. It is probable they gained over this judge by presents; at least the extortioners were accused of favouring them, to have the power of fleecing them in their turn. John Lunel, though an ecclesiastic, could not secure himself from this accusation. He was charged with receiving great sums from many Jews, for protecting them at the bar, and diminishing their taxes. The king suffered him to be cruelly treated; and his punishment would have been still greater, if one of his first ministers had not procured his pardon. A knight afterwards underwent the same fate: he was impeached of being corrupted by the Jews, whose commissary or overseer he was, and of having forged a false indenture, to which he put the king's seal, entrusted to him for the Jewish affairs. Complaint was brought to the king, and he recriminated upon the Jews who had assisted him. However, he could not rescue himself from the hands of justice, without the loss of his post, and a considerable fine.

The holy war furnished Henry with a new pretence for oppressing his subjects. The pope had written a very cogent letter to him, to oblige him to crusade, and succour the king of France out of hand. He engaged to do it; but at the same time pillaged the Jews of all they had remaining; and after this spoil, deprived the Christians of their jewels, and every thing that was valuable.

Henry afterwards spread a report, that the king of Spain designed to declare war against him. This was advanced as a new motive for his demanding supplies from his people. The peers of the realm being assembled at London, remonstrated, that being drained by former taxes, they could contribute no farther: that if the king of Castile did effectually make war, they would not refuse their assistance; but his design being yet concealed, they could not raise subsidies upon uncertain rumours. They had the better reason for what they did, because the king's desire was only to satisfy the avarice of foreigners at his court. The weight of this refusal fell upon the Jews, who had less authority, but more wealth. Fresh sums being demanded of them, which they could not pay, Elias of London spoke for them all, and represented to the council, that, since they had resolved to sink them, they had better expel them the kingdom, or grant them the liberty of departing; as, perhaps, they might somewhere else find a prince who had some sentiments of justice or humanity; that the king knew well that, tho' he should denounce the heaviest penalties, they could not furnish the sum demanded of them. However, the council denied them the liberty of departing; but the tax was moderated, and by this means they drew from them the little they had remaining.

Henry renewed these extortions the year following. He represented that, notwithstanding all the taxes he had raised, he still continued involved in debt. He solemnly declared his debts amounted to two or three hundred thousand marks. He observed, that he must defray the expences of his household; and therefore he demanded eight thousand marks of the Jews. They represented once more to the king, that they were ready to quit the kingdom, and that the pope's usurers had compleated their ruin. The king, enraged with this refusal, sold them to his brother Richard. It was not doubted but that Richard would treat them more harshly than his brother, and demand double the payment of his debt; but he took pity on them, because he was convinced of their poverty and distress.

Besides these misfortunes which overwhelmed them, the Jews of Lincoln were accused of murdering a child. There were three particular circumstances in this accusation. One was, that the Jews of Lincoln had invited four others from every city in England to assist at this sacrifice. A second, that the murderer confessed, when his life was promised him, that this sacrifice was renewed every year, though it was not always discovered. The third was, that the king refusing to ratify the promise of saving the Jews, they not only put him to death, but arrested ninety-one prisoners at London, and punished many others of them capitally.

The king, who reigned with such extortion, and exhausted his subjects by his avarice, must of necessity create himself cruel enemies; therefore they combined against him in England. The earls of Leicester and Gloucester heading the leaguers, gave him battle, in which his brother Richard, who was called king of Germany, because he had been elected emperor by the suffrages of some princes, and king Henry, with his son Edward, were made prisoners of war. Edward made his escape, by obtaining the liberty of exercising his horses in a neighbouring meadow. He defeated the earl of Leicester, who was found slain upon the spot; and Henry, having reascended the throne, confiscated the leaguers estates to the use of those who had continued faithful to him. But none of these revolutions were advantageous to the Jews; for the leaguers seized upon their synagogue at Lincoln, and passed from thence into the Isle of Ely, where they still made greater ravages. Thus, however the wheel of fortune turned, this unhappy nation was still oppressed.

It is pretended that Henry III. banished them out of England by an irrevocable edict. The motives of this exile are variously reported. A Jewish historian says, they were accused to the king of adulterating the coin. The king easily perceived the innocence of the accused, and that the deponents were guilty of the crime they had charged on others. But, notwithstanding, they went on with their accusation, and produced witnesses. The king seeing them so cruelly bent, was afraid that the people would exterminate that nation, and therefore ordered them to depart his territories.

Most Christian authors agree concerning this edict of banishment, made against the Jews at the end of the thirteenth century, in king Edward's reign; and manifest proofs are found of it in some chanceries of England. Trivet affirms, that Edward III. banished the Jews out of his kingdom, gave them money for their passage into France, and afterwards confiscated their estates. Polydore Virgil attributes this edict to a council held at London in the year 1291, which designing to separate the sheep from the goats, commanded, by a public edict, all the Jews to depart England in a few days, giving them liberty to carry away their effects. They obeyed the decree: and thus this nation, "Which was prodigiously numerous in England, departed out of it for ever; still wandering from one place to another, till it was entirely lost; and its loss will not be very affecting, provided they leave us their sacred books, without which it would be difficult to preserve our religion in future." Such is the reflection of this historian.

Edward, the preceding year, had passed such another decree for all the provinces he possessed in France. The motive alledged for this severity, was, that the Jews entering into too strict an intimacy with the Christians, corrupted them. However that might be, it is plain they never appeared in a body in this kingdom from that time till they were recalled to it in the time of Oliver Cromwell, as will be seen in its proper place.

Frequent accusations against the Jews in Germany. They countenance the irruptions of the Persians into the west. Assist the Tartars. Massacred in Bavaria. At Bern, &c. Learned rabbies in Germany. Jews flourish in Lithuania. Decrees of the council of Vienna. Precaution taken at Augsburg against false oaths. Jews again massacred. R. Mordecai hanged. Fresh commotions. Protected by the bishop of Spire. Persecutions caused by the Flagellants. Wells poisoned in Germany. Massacre in Bohemia. Jews finally expelled the empire.

WHETHER the Jews were really more wicked in Germany than in other countries, or the people more superstitiously zealous against them, there is not a kingdom where they have been accused of more enormous crimes, and of a greater variety and number of them, during these two centuries.

One of the principal crimes charged upon the Jews in Germany, was favouring the conquests of the Persians and Tartars, a multitude of whom quitted the east to ravage in the west. Their incursions did not last long; for they returned into Persia; and, astonished at the obstacles they found to their intended conquests, gave up a design which three magicians of the same nation at Cologne had suggested. It is said that the Jews of this country, whose dispersion inclined them to listen to every vague insinuation, flattered themselves that the Persians would become their deliverers. Their hopes and joy were the greater scandal to the Christians, because they did not disguise them, but called the son of him who commanded this army David, imagining that he would be their king.

Though their hopes were disappointed in this particular, they entertained new ones still more chimerical, when they heard that a prodigious multitude of Tartars had penetrated into Hungary, and, after they had ravaged it, threatened Bohemia, and the neighbouring countries. The emperor was in a consternation, and forced to sue for assistance to all Christian princes; and crusades were strongly recommended against those enemies of the Christian name, but with little success, because Frederic's enemy, the pope, fought his and the empire's ruin. The emperor, however, made head against the barbarians; and Conrade, his son, giving them battle, obliged them to retire. The Jews, elated with the transient prosperity they had enjoyed, imagined that the Tartars were of their nation, and that they came to their assistance. They pretended that their ancestors, who were taken to the banks of the Caspian Sea, had brought forth this people, that carried desolation and terror wherever they went, and therefore resolved to join and succour them with supplies of provisions and arms. To do this the more effectually, they promised the princes to poison the wine they carried, and thus to destroy these barbarians. But their fraud being discovered, they were made prisoners, delivered to the executioners, and died by their own swords. The most favourable thing for the Jews in this event was, that the emperor Frederic was also suspected of calling in these barbarians. However, the accusation was false; for the clergy and pope had invented it to render him odious: and so far was he from joining and corresponding with this nation, which came only with designs to ravage the empire, that he expelled them, and restored the king of Hungary to his throne.

They were accused, the same year, of obstructing the conversion of a young man of their nation, who was inclined to be baptized at Frankfort. This accusation seems better grounded than many others; because, as it was common for this people, and particularly amongst their fathers, in order to prevent the desertion of their children, frequently to go beyond the bounds prescribed by reason and the laws, the councils and emperors were often obliged to restrain the violence of the Jews in opposing these conversions. This opposition cost the city of Frankfort and the Jews very dear; for the people being incited that a conquest of this kind should be taken out of their hands, mutinied, and betook themselves to arms. Some Christians were killed in the fray; and 180 Jews were destroyed by the sword, or the fire that had been kindled; but the flames continuing, and raging from house to house, half the city was consumed, which subjected the rest of the Jews to fresh danger. The more prudent, to the number of twenty-four, were baptized, to avoid death, and among them the chief of their synagogue.

The accusation of killing children at the passover was current in Germany, and in all other places of the west. This crime was imputed to them at Haguenau, in the Lower Alsatia. They were accused of taking three children, of seven years old, which were found dead in one of their houses. Complaints of it were brought to the emperor, who dismissed the plaintiffs with an evasive answer, which still more exasperated the people.

A more alarming accusation was preferred in Bavaria, where an old woman confessed that she had delivered a child to the Jews, who had drained his blood for some sacrifice. The people of Munich rose, and, without staying for the sentence of the judge, massacred all the Jews they could meet with. The officers in vain opposing this fury, advised the rest of that nation to take sanctuary in a synagogue, which was a building of stone; but this rendered their misery the more general; for the people pursued them thither, set fire to the place, and burnt all those who thought themselves safe, whilst neither the duke or his officers could stop their rage.

Much such another accusation was brought against the Jews of Wertzburg and Bern, where they were massacred in the same manner; and the two children killed by them canonized for martyrs.

Notwithstanding all these accusations, the nation of the Jews continued to multiply in Germany. Learning flourished in the synagogues, which were governed by learned and illustrious rabbins. The city of Germesheim alone produced two; one of which was Baruch de Germesheim: for then they began to take surnames; and as noblemen took theirs from the fiefs and lands they possessed, men of letters commonly derived theirs from the cities where they were born. We have spoken sufficiently of Baruch. Eliezer de Germeciman was of the same city, and one of the greatest casuists, who produced a work of great worth and learning.

Isaac of Vienna, author of "The Light sown," took the pains to transcribe books for the synagogues of his country, to render them more correct and exact. He had Meir de Rottembourg for his disciple, who excelled his master, and became the judge and doctor of his nation, which drew upon him a long train of misfortunes; for, as he was thought to be very rich, or to have the management of his disciples purses, the emperor, who loved money, laid a great tax upon him, and imprisoned him for defect of payment. One of his disciples bailed him, but he died before he obtained his liberty. A work is ascribed to him, intitled, Hattisbats; but he is but indirectly the author of it, as it was his disciples, after his death, who made a collection of his decisions, and gave them this title.

The German Jews likewise extol their R. Amnon for his learning, riches, and beauty, as well as his miraculous recovery of all his fingers and toes, which the bishop of Mentz had caused to be cut off for declining a conference with him, which he had promised three days before: but this last circumstance has every semblance of a Jewish legend.

Besides the advantage they enjoyed in the thirteenth century, of having a considerable number of great men, they met with another; for Boleslaus, surnamed the Chaste, gave them liberty of conscience in Lithuania, with the addition of many considerable privileges, which they preserved for many ages. He only imitated other princes, who generally took this nation into their protection. This appears from the council of Vienna held at that time.

The council observed, that the number and power of the Jews were so great, that the revenues of parish priests were considerably lessened by them; and therefore they were obliged to make them amends proportionably to the profits they would have received from Christian families living in their parishes: that they hindered their wives and children from embracing Christianity, and yet circumcised Christians, which was a prejudice to religion: and, lastly, that they multiplied their synagogues, making them larger, higher, and more sumptuous. The council restrained these abuses by new decrees; and, at the same time that it allowed the ancient synagogues, ordered the new ones to be pulled down.

But these decrees were insignificant, whilst princes and great men protected those who refused to obey them, and ordered their officers to defend those who implored their succours. The disorder proceeded to the last extremity, inasmuch that it was declared to the princes and their officers, that they were excommunicated and banished the church, if they continued to protect the Jews, and refused to execute what the ecclesiastics had determined against them.

They were obliged soon after to make fresh regulations at Augsburgh, on account of the improper oaths which were till then administered to them, and which they made no scruple to break; and to oblige them to swear by the laws of Moses, holding their hand on the Pentateuch. The misfortune is, that even this last kind of oath is held by them to be annulled on the grand expiation day; so that at the most they can be of force but one whole year. We may add, that they have their casuists likewise, who allow them to equivocate according to that concession of the Talmud, that it is lawful to dissimble for the sake of peace.

Their disputes with the Caraites were then very violent. The latter were headed by a learned man, who, not content to expose the extravagancies of the Talmud, and compose a treatise on them, under the title of doctor Aaron, explained all the articles of faith, and called his book the Tree of Life, because he did not believe life was to be had without believing these articles. He believed the resurrection of the dead, but confined it only to the house of Israel. As zealous as he was for his sect, it began then to degenerate from its first precision; for being fond of traditions, Nissi, the son of Noah, who lived at that time, was obliged to explain the Mishnah, because it was earnestly desired of him. Aaron was also forced to pay some deference to his disciples; and, that he might not disgust them, gave an allegorical explication of several scripture passages. The Talmudists were glad to see their enemies make an advance in their favour; but they were not reconciled, for their controversies continued as violent as ever.

They soon laboured under a greater misfortune than that of disputes and division. A peasant, named Raind Flaish, rose up during the wars that disturbed Germany, through the competition of Adolphus of Nassau, and Albertus of Austria, who were elected emperors, and taking advantage of this confusion, gave out in the Upper Palatinate, that he had a divine commission to exterminate the Jews. He ran over Franconia, and the neighbouring provinces, proclaiming every where the same thing. To give his pretence the more weight, he asserted, that they had stole a consecrated wafer. The people rose upon this accusation, without examining it farther. The inhabitants of Nuremberg, Nuremberg, Rottembourg, Amberg, and other cities of Bavaria and Franconia, excited by Raind Flaish, seized all the Jews in that country, and committed them to the flames. Some chole rather to burn themselves, with their furniture, wives and children, than be thrown into the fire by the Christians. Ratisbonne more humanely saved its citizens. Duke Albertus of Austria was willing to restrain this violence; but he durst not make a bold experiment at a time that his power tottered; and the least discontent of the people, who looked upon Raind Flaish as a messenger from heaven, would have made them declare for the Count de Nassau. He was forced, therefore, to wait for a more favourable opportunity, which at length occurring, the Jews were restored to their privileges, and Nuremberg amerced in a great fine, which was so much the more burthensome, because part of the city had been reduced to ashes by the fire the oppressed had put to their houses.

R. Mordecai hanged.

The hatred of its inhabitants was not extinguished, for it burst out again ten or twelve years after, and the famous R. Mordecai of Austria lost his life by it. He had composed a commentary upon some books of the Talmud, and some works of Isaac Alphez, which are in great esteem. He collected all he thought worthy of notice from the books of ten rabbies, to which he added his own observations. He left Austria to come and teach at Triers, where Isaac, whose family came from Dijon, was his colleague; but returning to Nuremberg, he was condemned to be hanged there.

Fresh commotions.

The confusion, instead of lessening, increased. One Armleder, in the neighbourhood of Nassau, heading some peasants, and encouraging them with the hopes of plunder, caused them to take up arms against the Jews. They over-ran several places, killing all they met with, to enrich themselves with the spoils. The emperor Lewis of Bavaria, foreseeing the consequences of this commotion, put a stop to it, by taking off Armleder's head, who had occasioned so destructive a sedition.

The Jews protected by the bishop of Spire.

Pope Clement V. having called a council at Vienna against the templars, made a decree against usury, and those that exacted it. He also condemned the approvers of it as heretics. This decree being published, the Jews were exposed to many oppressions, which their exorbitant usuries upon the Christians drew upon them. They were brought before the tribunals, and disputed their principal for having violated the law of the Christians. They especially felt the effects of this law in Germany. But Menicho, bishop of Spire, took upon him their defence; he argued, that the law did not respect them, because the church does not judge those that are without. He was persuaded that it was lawful for them to demand usury, since they had been dealt with without any design of fraud; and therefore he severely prohibited their being disturbed about usuries for the future.

The zeal of the Flagellants was a fresh source of their calamities. This sect, which had been almost extinct, resumed vigour in the year 1349, and caused new massacres. A company of people, mustered under certain leaders, assembled twice a day, and stripping before the people, scourged themselves with cords. They drew into this fraternity the people of Spire, Straßbourg, and some other places. These people, exasperated by the Flagellants against the Jews, seized them, and burnt them in great numbers at Thuringia. But their greatest calamity happened at Frankfort, where the Flagellants, having committed some disorders, had consented to an accommodation, when a Jew, named Cicogne, whose family was numerous in the place, desiring to avenge his brethren, threw a piece of fire-work into the town-house. The flame reached the church, which was presently reduced to ashes, and burnt as far as Saxenhausen. Such a crime as this could not be suffered to go unpunished: not only the guilty perished, but all the Jews in the city, except a few that escaped into Bohemia.

Persecutions caused by the Flagellants.

The Jews were accused, the same year, of poisoning the wells, fountains, and rivers; though upon no other foundation than that they escaped the common mortality, which, through the prevalence of the plague, happened in most parts of Europe. A suspicion was sufficient to condemn them; and people employed all the remains of strength and life they had to murder their enemies. They burnt the Jews in some places, and massacred them in others. Those of Mentz defended themselves, and surprizing two hundred disarmed Christians, were cruel in their turn, and took an unmerciful revenge of them. The populace, provoked at this barbarity, ran to arms, and fell upon their enemies with such fury, that twelve thousand of them perished on that single occasion. "They set fire to their houses; and the flames spread to that degree, as to melt down the great bell and glass of the church of St. Quintin. This torrent over-run all Germany: the imperial cities pulled down their houses, and made use of the materials to build castles and towers. They were the more violently bent upon the ruin of the houses of the Jews, because they found great riches in the ruins." All the inhabitants of Ulm were burnt, with their families and effects. The princes durst not engage in so critical an affair, and the Jews found no where any place of retreat. There was no place but Lithuania where they enjoyed any quiet, because Casimer the Great, who was in love with a beautiful Jewess, named Esther, had granted them great privileges.

Wells poisoned in Germany.

Those that fled to Bohemia could not find long quiet there. The people of Prague, disgusted at seeing them celebrate the feast of the pass-over, chose that day, above all others, to burn their synagogue, and those that performed their devotions in it. The project was easily executed: none made opposition, or escaped the death that was prepared for them. This was so doleful an event, that the synagogue of Prague preserves the memory of it in a prayer made some time after, to deplore its calamity.

Massacre in Bohemia.

Two years after Wenceslaus, king of Bohemia, and emperor, with design to please his subjects, to whom his vices had rendered him extremely odious, discharged the nobility from all their debts to the Jews. This decree induced people to believe they might attempt any thing against a nation which the emperor refused to protect. The massacre began at Gotha, and grew terrible when the peasants joined the insurgents. Those of Spire put all to the sword, without regard to age or sex, except some children, whom they carried to the church to be baptized. However, as such sort of executions are odious, and depopulate countries, a stop was put to them, by punishing some the mutineers.

The

The Jews were again accused of poisoning the wells; and this accusation, which drew death after it, and the most cruel tortures, spread itself into Germany, Italy, and Provence; at least the Jewish historians give us this account: but at the same time they add, that the emperor acknowledged their innocence, and represented to his council, that it was impossible to poison a running fountain that constantly supplied fresh waters. But the people maintaining, that they had seen the Jews throw poison into them, and pronouncing some words in a low voice at the same time, the emperor, upon their importunities, resolved to banish them. The notice of this caused great rejoicing among the seditious, as if there was no punishment too cruel for those that had been the destruction of so many Christians: and thus the emperor was obliged to order them, by proclamation, either to fly, or change their religion.

THE Jews had lived for a long time, and multiplied in Spain, where they had their synagogues, famous doctors, and considerable settlements, when Ferdinand, pretending a zeal for religion, resolved to banish them. The synagogues were pulled down, the people exiled, and the families, who were terrified with this banishment, reduced to dissemble from one generation to another. But as this revolution did not happen till the end of the fifteenth century, and was preceded with many considerable events, we shall give an account of them before we pass on to their final expulsion.

The anti-pope Benedict XIII. was in Arragon, the only place he had remaining, and which was his whole jurisdiction. He was inclined to signalize his zeal by attacking the Jews. He began with conferences. Jerome de Sancta Fide, who had deserted the synagogue, and was his physician, put him upon this design, by assuring him, that he could convince all his adversaries, from passages out of the Talmud, of the rectitude of their tenets. The principal rabbies of the kingdom were summoned, and Don Vidal was chosen for the defendant on the part of the Jews in this controversy.

As Benedict defrayed all the charges, the Jews treated him with singular complaisance and respect; though they expressed themselves with some acrimony against his physician, who, as appears, was the chief promoter, as well as conductor, of this conference. The tenor and success of it are variously related by the Jewish and Christian historians, who have transmitted it to us, though they both were present, and bore a share in it.

The Jews own that they gave many bishops, who were present, money to prevail with the pope to put a speedy end to it; but that the pope remained steady, and would have Jerome de Sancta Fide stand to his promise. They add, that their doctors came off with honour; that they were only ordered to restore part of the excessive usuries they had taken from the Christians; but that, upon application to Mark, pope of Florence, they were discharged, and set at entire liberty.

The Christians assert, that Jerome, having presented a writing the same year to the anti-pope, containing the dangerous errands of the Talmud against the law and the Christians, one of the rabbies present gave the cardinal of St. Angelo a writing, in which he declared, that the passages drawn from this book appeared to him offensive and erroneous: that it was true, another sense might be given them, but that he did not know it; and therefore he confessed, that he does not pretend to defend them, nor justify them, and disowns all the answers he might have made to elude them. And all the rabbies present, except Joseph Albo and Ferrer, subscribed the same declaration.

The Christians add, that three or four thousand persons were converted by Jerome's piece, which rendered it infinitely valuable: and that Joseph Albo, who was afraid all the synagogues would be deserted, composed the Articles of Faith; in which he endeavoured to settle the wavering faith of the people.

It is most certain that Benedict XIII. the year following published a constitution against the Talmud, and the Jewish usuries. But as this anti-pope was deposed some time after, his constitution was concealed with his other ordinances, so that the Jews felt not the effect of it. It is known too, that Joseph Albo endeavoured to confirm the faith of the Jews that was staggered by this conference. He published his Articles of Faith, which he reduced to the existence of God, the law of Moses, and future punishments and rewards. His work is in such esteem, that Gedalia, a Polander, has commented upon it, under the title of the Planted Tree: his notes are the roots of the tree, the references to scripture passages are the branches, and the allegorical explications the leaves. Thus this commentary is a perfect or planted tree.

Benedict's constitution against the Talmud.

Vincent Ferrier, another famous converter, appeared at this time. They call him, "The Splendor of Spain, the Light of Valencia, the Prodigy of the Universe, and the Model of the Dominicans." He was chosen to maintain to the people the validity of Ferdinand's election; who by that means became king of Spain, and who afterwards made him a noble recompence. He was steward of the palace, and confessor to the anti-pope Benedict XIII. In a word, they have not failed to canonize him, and there is hardly a church in Spain but receives his office.

Different notions concerning Vincent Ferrier.

The Jews call him Mummar, that is, apostate, as if he had deserted the synagogue to embrace Christianity. But yet it is said, that he was born a Christian, of an illustrious family, and known at Valencia, which, for a long time, had gone by the name of Ferrier.

Notwithstanding all this eclat, the conversions he made must be still much suspected, because they were but of short duration. There is a writing preserved in the Vatican library, of one Duran, a rabbi, who, after he had embraced Christianity, wrote to his son, that he should not imitate his father. The whole letter was equivocal. It was believed, at first reading, that it was an exhortation to stand fast in the religion he had embraced: but the mystery was easily discovered; and it appeared, from attentive consideration, that this father meant to oblige his son to return to Judaism, which he had left at Vincent Ferrier's instigation, and embraced again four years after. Indeed, most of the new converts, having dissembled for some time, took off the disguise, and made it known, that they had only yielded to force and necessity.

Vincent Ferrier's conversions not sincere.

Such were the conversions of Vincent Ferrier in Spain. The Jews, whom he had drawn by multitudes into the church, were no sooner at home, than they resumed the practice of their ancient ceremonies. They circumcised their children in secret, observed the feast of the passover, and all other Jewish festivals and rites.

As the Jews were brought in for their share in all the miseries that befel the kingdoms where they lived, lived, they had a good part in the insurrection of the city of Toledo, which complained that its privileges had been violated by the imposition of a tax, though a light one, and necessary to the war. The mutineers plundered the houses of the richest citizens, and slew those that resisted. The Jews were not spared; but the violence was carried even to the posterity of the converts, when laws were enacted, excluding all, both Jewish and heathen new converts, from all offices. The clergy protected them; for the dean of the cathedral church of Toledo reprobated this order of the inhabitants; and caused public theses to be held, in which he opposed it. The better to manifest the consequence and injustice of it, or rather to engage a greater number of people in his interest, he mentioned many illustrious families by name, who were allied to those of the converted Jews, and therefore deprived of employments. Pope Nicholas V. then published a bull against this decree, excommunicating all those who offered to exclude the converted Jews and heathens from political and ecclesiastical offices, from the priesthood and government.

All this while the Jews were esteemed and protected by king Alphonso the Great, and his grandees; and it is under his reign that one of their writers places a conference which happened between that monarch and one Thomas, surnamed the Subtle Philosopher, who came opportunely thither; as one of the bishops had preached a severe sermon against them, in which he imprudently affirmed that they could not celebrate their passover without shedding some Christian blood. The king was happy in having so learned a man to confute that absurd notion, which he accordingly did, and with that strength and energy that might be expected from a person of his character.

However, the synagogue was then in possession of great advantages; for, besides the learned of Arragon before-mentioned, many others appeared. Chamaï was famous at that time for his casuistry.

Joel, the son of Sciocu, published sermons. This preacher was prolix and diffuse, the too common error of those who harangue the people: yet he was much esteemed as a learned man; and competent judges have thought his explication of some chapters of the Pentateuch very instructive.

Lastly, the family of Alcadeb produced two famous astronomers, the uncle and nephew, who both compiled astronomical tables. But we shall not insist longer upon this head, as we shall find hereafter many learned men included in the sentence of condemnation and banishment, and involved in the last calamity that swallowed up this nation, and expelled it out of Spain.

Ferdinand and Isabella accomplished this work. After they had put an happy end to the war against the Moors, they thought of nothing more than demolishing the synagogues, and getting rid of the Jews. To this end they issued an edict, commanding that nation to depart the kingdom of Spain within the space of four months, or embrace Christianity. Turrecremata, who was the instigator of this persecution, advised shortening the term, and forbade the supplying them with provisions, under great penalties, or lending any assistance to those who should not be gone in April. Some historians are of opinion, that the liberty granted them of carrying off their gold and jewels was revoked, and that they were only permitted to change them for cloth, wine, and other merchandize. But this prohibition was not rigorously executed, since the Jews found means to carry off thirty millions of ducats. Such as had the courage to leave their country, were obliged to pay some ducats per head to the king for their freight; and those that would not, or could not, go for want of money, became slaves, and their goods were confiscated. This last clause was so rigorously executed, that two vessels which were laden, not being able to sail at the fixed time, they unmercifully sold all those that were on board to the Spaniards.

Marianus affirms, that seventy thousand families, or eight hundred thousand persons, left Spain, pursuant to this edict. The Jews reckon an hundred and twenty thousand families, and six hundred thousand individuals. The favour Abravanel so long had with the king and queen, could not preserve him from the same fate. He was obliged to embark, and depart with the rest, for Italy. He must have been accustomed to exiles; for, however glorious his life was, he was often obliged to fly. In the bloom of his youth he appeared at the court of Alphonso in Portugal, and had a great share in his favour; but John II. his son, having different notions, Abravanel stole secretly into the kingdom of Castile. Ferdinand and Isabella appointed him to the superintendence of their finances. They say he amassed great treasure in a short time, and was expelled with the rest of his nation. He retired to Naples, and quickly procured the king's favour, to whom he did great services: but this prince being dead, and Charles VIII. having possessed himself of the kingdom of Naples without any opposition, Abravanel was obliged to fly to Sicily, with Alphonso II. who succeeded his father. He preserved his fidelity to his prince in the midst of distresses which despoiled him of his riches and crown. Alphonso died in Sicily; and Abravanel was obliged again to change his place of refuge. This rabbi is famous, not only for a long series of vicissitudes, but especially for his works. He is the most useful of all the rabbies for the understanding of scripture. He wrote in a pure and intelligible style; though it be too prolix, and hath more of the strain of a rhetorician than a commentator. He explains the literal sense of scripture, and handles the most important questions that are found in the books he has commented. He was a good-natured man, and lived in familiarity with the Christians.

There was also amongst the famous refugees of that time, Isaac, the son of Arama, a great philosopher, and greater casuist. The Jews highly esteem his Explication of the Law; though some critics think it too diffuse, allegorical, and full of morals altogether Jewish. He brought with him R. Meir, his son, one of the principal rabbies of his time, and author of a commentary upon Job, which Buxtorf has attributed to his father. Another was Joseph Gigatella, who, during his exile, applied himself to the exposition of the divine attributes and names. Isaac Karo was one of these exiles. He retired first into Portugal, and went thence to Jerusalem; but he lost his children and books by the way. He lived a very solitary life, and composed the Generations of the Children of Isaac, to comfort those that had lost them. Abraham Zacuth lived also at that time. Bartolucci confounds him with Abraham the Jew, who has translated a Treatise about the Virtue of Medicines, out of Arabic. These two authors published a perpetual almanack; and both of them were great studiers of astronomy. The latter was of Salamanca, and taught at Saragossa; but he was obliged to quit his country by Ferdinand's edict. He retired to Portugal, where king Emanuel gave him the title of his historiographer. Here it was he composed the Juchassin, the famous book of generations from the creation of the world to the year 1500.

The misery of the exiles was extreme. The fire seized some transport vessels, and consumed all the passengers: many were shipwrecked, and perished in the sea, either through default, or design of the pilots. The pestilence having infected the rest, the pilots set them on shore. Part of those that landed being cured, died of hunger. Others arrived at Fez, where the inhabitants, frightened at such multitudes of fugitives, shut up the gates. They were forced to set up tents in the fields, and to live upon herbs, which the drought and barrenness rendered very scarce. Besides the injuries of the air, they were compelled to submit to the insolence of some inhabitants, who thought all things were permitted them against the miserable. One of them took a virgin by force from her parents face; and afterwards murdered dered her, for fear she had conceived, and would bring forth a Jew. A sailor surprized a company of children, who came to look for shell and other fish when the sea retired. He brought them on board his bark, where he gave them bread, which attracted a great number of them. One day he weighed anchor, and carried off all the young children, which he sold to some persons of quality, and made slaves of the rest. Many other and more atrocious cruelties were perpetrated by these barbarians.

Ferdinand's policy censured.

People murmured greatly against the politics of the king of Spain, who depopulated his kingdom by so mistaken a persecution. Besides, he ran the risk of a rebellion, since 800,000 people, driven to despair, were capable of making a dangerous insurrection; and Abravanel had reason to extol this exemplary fidelity of his nation, when it might have taken arms against its persecutors, and raised a civil war for so severe a decree. Ferdinand doubtless had taken precautions against an event he had reason to fear. Religion seemed only a veil to cover the conduct of Ferdinand, who was infinitely ambitious. We cannot answer for the motions of the human mind, whose springs are not only hidden, but different, according to the circumstances of times. But it seems that the king and queen sacrificed the prosperity of the kingdom to ambition, their predominant passion.

Jews ret. out to Portugal.

John II. king of Portugal, lying at the very gates of Spain, was willing to enrich himself with his neighbours spoils. The interest of his kingdom demanded, that he should afford a retreat to the Jews, from whom he had received considerable services. He had sent some of them to the coast of Ormus, and the Red Sea, who brought him a faithful account, and served him in the discovery of the East-Indies; but yet he did not love them. Nevertheless, from motives of policy, he received them, but imposed on them most rigorous conditions. Each was obliged to pay him eight gold crowns for the privilege of refuge. He moreover fixed a time, beyond which it was not lawful for them to continue in his territories without entering into slavery. The two conditions were discharged by many fugitives that retired into this kingdom, and afterwards chose rather to live in slavery, than expose themselves to fresh misfortunes. They complained that he sent a vast number into the Isles of Thieves, newly discovered, where they miserably perished. But at the same time they comfort themselves with a notion, that Heaven took vengeance on him; for he died young; and his son, who, by marrying Isabella, became heir to many kingdoms, fell from his horse into the Tagus, from whence he was carried to a peasant's cottage, where he died; so that the crown devolved to another branch.

Treaty between king of Portugal
and Jews.

Emanuel, John's successor, at first seemed to compassionate these oppressed wretches, and restored them to their liberty. But the alliance he made with Isabella and Ferdinand altered his first notion. Isabella plainly declared, that she would not have a man to her son-in-law that suffered the enemies of their religion in his kingdom. Emanuel, therefore, sacrificed the Jews and Moors to an alliance he thought more advantageous. He allowed both of them to depart out of his dominions. He kept his word with the latter, as fearing reprisals would be made in Africa upon the Christians. But he doubly violated his faith with the Jews, by depriving them of the liberty to carry away their children above fourteen years of age, which reduced them to that despair, that some of them killed themselves; and others, sacrificing nature to their religion, became their own executioners. Besides, after they had assigned them three ports, whither they were to embark, they reduced them to one, so that they were obliged to alter their measures, make a double journey, and exhaust their treasures. In fine, the delays that were given to the embarkation made great numbers miserable.

Amongst those that turned Christians, to avoid such a train of disasters as they saw before them, many were hastily used, from a too just mistrust of their sincerity; and a great number were massacred upon the first slight occasion: all which outrages seem to have been but too much encouraged by the cruelty and treachery with which king Emanuel had used that unfortunate people.

Some historians charge this disaster upon the Jews, affirming, they drew it upon themselves, because some of them, after publicly professing Christianity, and being baptized, were found celebrating the feast of the passover in secret: but Mariana ought to be preferred before all foreign and German authors. Nevertheless, it is true that most of those that remained in Spain and Portugal dissimulated instead of being converted, which is the natural effect of persecution in matters of religion. The most surprising thing is, that this religion spreads from generation to generation, and still subsists in the persons of dissimulators to a remote posterity. In vain the great men of Spain make alliances, change their names, and take ancient escutcheons; they are still known to be of a Jewish race, and Jews themselves. The convents of monks and nuns are full of them. Most of the canons, inquisitors, and bishops, proceed from this nation. Moreover, he brings proof of his assertion, in maintaining, that there are, in the synagogue of Amsterdam, brothers and sisters, and near relations to good families of Spain and Portugal; and even Franciscan monks, Dominicans, and Jesuits, who come to do penance, and atone for the crime they have committed in dissimulating.

tion of many Jews, and those amongst the eminent for birth and learning.

Among those who, being at length tired with such impious dissimulation, returned to Judaism, divers were men of great learning, and appear by their works to have been well versed in the Jewish laws. Joseph, the son of Joshua, who continued his chronology till the year 1554, was a Spaniard, and the best historian this nation has had since Josephus. Ben Virgæ was another Spaniard, who has collected several necessary rules for the understanding the Gemara, which are the more useful, because they were forgotten by other interpreters. Isaac Cordofa, a descendant also from the Portuguese dissimulators, became one of the principal physicians of Castile; where he wrote his Spanish tract concerning the usefulness of water and snow, and cold or hot drink. But at length, being tired with his disguise, he quitted Spain and the Catholic religion with his name of Ferdinand, which he had received at his baptism, and retired to Verona about the middle of the last century. He printed his treatise, in which he expatiates on the particular prerogatives of the Jewish people, which ought to make them honoured, notwithstanding their miseries and dispersions, which God only sends for the punishment of their sins. He observes, that this nation was chosen by God; that it alone is separated from all other nations; that it received the sabbath and circumcision from heaven; and that the divinity instructed it by inspired men. For these reasons the inquisition is watchful over these new Christians; and they are still suspected by the cruel ministers of this tribunal, who enrich themselves with their spoils. The least suspicion suffices to make them guilty. For, indeed, whenever any accident happens in the kingdom, the people accuse them of judaizing in secret, and bringing down the Divine vengeance. An instance of it was seen at the beginning of the last century, when a Dominican put himself at the head of these mutineers, and they plundered, ravaged, and killed, four or five thousand of these converts.

The Jewish authors bitterly complain that these severities are still continued in full vigour against them at Cordova, Lisbon, Conosbra, and even in the East and West Indies.

Jews under Tamerlane.

THE Jews suffered much by the rapid conquests of Tamerlane; for this conqueror, having fixed his capital at Samarcand, passed on to Chorazan, where they were numerous. He seized upon Bagdad, and all the Irak; and passed into Syria, where he plundered Damascus. He defeated Bajazet, who reigned in Anatolia, where this nation had considerable settlements; and, as he laid waste all places where his armies marched, it is no wonder that the Jews were ruined and dispersed by his invasions. Tamerlane followed Gingizkan's religion, which consisted in seven or eight precepts, dictated by the law of nature. Though he has been represented as a barbarian and illiterate, because he had followed no other profession than arms, yet he was a lover of men of letters, and maintained a great number of them, with whom he often conversed. Physicians and astronomers were very well received at his court. Hence we have reason to believe that many Jews were in it, since they excelled in these two sciences.

Establishment of the
the Great
Mogul.

The conquests of Tamerlane were divided betwixt his sons and grandsons, who could not agree about sharing the succession, and weakened themselves by their division. Nevertheless, they supported themselves an hundred years, till a commander of the Uzbeks entered Chorazan, and, by conquest, took it from them. Arbek, a descendant of Tamerlane, was obliged to fly to the Indies, where he set up the empire of the Great Mogul. We are told there was a province of Cachemire full of Jews, that came thither in Solomon or Salamanazar's time, who have left traces of their establishment, by which they are discovered at this day. Mr. Thevenot desired one of his friends to examine whether the inhabitants of this country had the Holy Scripture, and whether their Old Testament was like ours? But he answered, that though there were formerly Jews there, there were none at present. "All are (said he) either heathens or Mahometans. Perhaps some of them might be found in China; for I have lately seen in the hands of our R. P. jesuit of Delhi, letters of a German jesuit, written from Pekin, signifying that he had seen such as had preferred Judaism and the Old Testament; and that they would even have made the jesuit their kakan, provided he would abstain from swines flesh. However, we may still find here some traces of Judaism. The first is, that, as you enter this kingdom, after the passage of the Pire-Penjabe mountain, all the inhabitants I saw in the first villages seemed to me to be Jews, by their make and looks, and, in fine, by something particular which ever distinguishes this nation. This notion is not peculiar to me; for our Father Jesuit, and many of our Europeans, had it before me. The second is, that I observed the name of Mousa, which signifies Moses, to be much used among the people of this city, though Mahometans. The third, that they say commonly that Solomon came into their country; and that it was he who cut the mountain Baramoule, to give current to the waters. The fourth, that Moses died at Cachemire, and that his tomb is a league from this city. And the fifth, that they pretend this little and very ancient edifice, which appears here upon an high mountain, was built by Solomon; for which reason it is still called Solomon's throne. Thus I should not be willing to deny that some "of them have penetrated as far as this place. But in the course of time, these people might have lost the purity of their law, turned idolaters, and at last Mahometans."

The writer, who gives this account, is in the right; for it is not to be doubted but that there were some Jews in the dominions of the Great Mogul. The miseries they were reduced to in the east, by frequent wars, obliged some of them to follow Arbek, with his other fugitive subjects; and as they go into all places where they can make their fortunes, the prosperity of these princes might, in their turn, draw over merchants, astronomers, and physicians.

The body of the nation remained in Persia and Media: but as their academies had been destroyed, and the sciences could not flourish amidst the confusions of war, their learned men, and heads of the captivity, have for a long time disappeared; and even the private persons, dispersed in the provinces and cities, made a sad figure, because they had been ruined. It is said they raised their heads under Ishmael Sophi, founder of the family that reigned in Persia. This prince, who reckoned himself a descendant from Ali, gathered all those who were devoted to this sect, and all the unfortunate that would follow him. He found but seven or eight thousand men in Caramania, which is the ancient Cilicia; but with this small number he threw himself into one of the provinces of Media, and slew Ferokhead, the king of it. This first victory, obtained at fourteen years of age, put him in a capacity to take Tauris, which some geographers confound with Ecabatana, and make himself master not only of the rest of Media, but also of Persia.

Conquest of Ishmael Sophi.

Ishmael Sophi died in the year 1520, being thirty-eight years old, and left the empire to his son Thahamasb, who, being engaged in a long war with Soliman, was at last obliged to ruin his own country, that he might not be pursued, nor taken in his retreat. The sultaness poisoned him, to set a son she had by him on the throne. But as this son was visiting his father's treasures, his sister caused him to be slain by the officers she had suborned to execute her design. She presently released Ishmael II. her other brother, out of prison, to place him upon the throne: but he ungratefully slew her a little time after. His subjects, unable to bear him, poisoned him after a reign of two years; and established a third son of Thahamasb, who was blind, and called Ishmael. From this blind prince proceeded the famous Shah Abbas, who undertook to persecute the Jews, which gave occasion to a general massacre a long time after his death. The matter is thus related:

Succession
of Sophi.

Shah Abbas's council representing to him that Persia was very thinly peopled, he resolved to grant great privileges to all that would come and settle there. Multitudes of people arrived from all the neighbouring parts, and particularly a great number of Jews, who, by monopolizing the trade, amassed great riches. They soon excited the jealousy of the other inhabitants, who brought their complaints against them to the sophi. There was no expedient to punish them without giving umbrage to other strangers, whom the violation of privileges, granted for some years, would oblige to retire. But it was found in the Alcoran, that this nation was to embrace the Mussulman religion six hundred years after its publication, or be entirely destroyed. Abbas, who was naturally cruel, would have executed Mahomet's orders, and have cut off all the Jews, if the musti had not stopped him. It was resolved, however, to cite the kacams, or sages, of the nation, before the sophi's tribunal, to answer his demands.

Shah Abbas questioned them particularly about the abolition of the sacrifices, and the other ceremonies, the use of which had ceased for some time. After a variety of arguments and interrogatories, Abbas insisted that they should fix a time for the appearance of their expected Messiah, promising that till then they should be tolerated; and that if he came came accordingly, he and his successors would embrace their religion; but if, on the contrary, he did not appear, the Jews should either turn Mussulmen, or suffer the loss of their lives, children, and effects. After mature deliberation, they fixed the period at seventy years. Abbas made them pay dear for their toleration, caused the agreement to be registered and signed on both sides, and taxed the Jews at two millions of gold.

An hundred and fifteen years elapsed after Abbas's reign, and yet none thought of the contract he had made with the Jews. Indeed, the empire of the Persians was disturbed with almost continual wars with the Turks, who seized upon Bagdad, whilst their forces were employed against the Great Mogul. Amurath IV. found many Jews there, who had remained in this country ever since their first dispersion: but though this prince, violating his promise, put the Persians to the sword, that he might weaken his enemy by this massacre, yet he spared this nation, because he thought it was very useful to him.

The war caused so great a distraction at the Persian court, that the treaty Shah Abbas had made with the Jews was not executed. But we are told that Abbas II. who began his reign in 1642, and was a little more at peace, turning over one day the registers of the palace, found, in his father's journal, the contract between the Jews and Shah Abbas I. This surprised him the more, as Zabathai Tzevi made a great noise at that time, and most of the Jews looked upon him as the person who was come to disengage them from their obligation. He assembled a great council, to deliberate about so important an affair; and it was therein unanimously resolved to destroy, without delay, this nation, abounding with cheats and impostors, that laboured only to oppress the rest of mankind. Orders were given to all the inhabitants, both strangers and natives of the sopher's dominions, to fall upon the Jews, and to spare neither age or sex, except such as should turn Mussulmen. This massacre began at Ispahan, the capital of his kingdom. It was exercised with the same barbarity in the provinces of Seyra, Gheren, Humadan, Ardan, and Tauris, where the Jews were settled. The execution lasted three years, without any glimpse of humanity or compassion from the Persians; inasmuch, that there remained not one single Jew in all that vast extent of provinces, where they had heaped up immense riches. Some escaped the barbarity, by going into the Turkish territories and the Indies, and abjuring Judaism.

But as Shah Abbas observed that most of these conversions were feigned and forced, it is not improbable that they might disgust him from proceeding farther, and induce him to restore to them the full liberty of their religion, in which it was the custom of the Persians to indulge all strangers. We read accordingly, that they enjoyed it a long time, till a minister of state, who hated them, or designed to enrich himself by the persecution, engaged his master to oblige them to turn Mahometans. He employed his utmost efforts, sparing neither violence or lenity to succeed in his design. There was also an order of the prince, forbidding the exercise of the Jewish religion in his dominions: but, notwithstanding all this, he could not effect it; for, upon diligent observation, it was found, that whatever pretences they made to Mahometism, they practised Judaism still; so that there was a necessity of permitting them to turn bad Jews again, since they could not be made good Mussulmen. In the mean time all those that are at Ispahan are poor and miserable, and in small numbers. They pay annually a sequin per head to the king, and are obliged to wear a little square piece of stuff, of two or three fingers breadth, sewed to their cap or robe, in the middle of their breast, about two inches above their girdle. It signifies nothing of what stuff this patch is made, provided the colour be different from that of the habit it is sewed to.

It is plain, moreover, from Thevenot, who travelled in this country from the year 1663 to 1665, that is some years before the time of the Jewish massacre, that, upon his going thither, they enjoyed full liberty of conscience, since he adds, that the Persians thought it strange that Eatemad Doulet should have undertaken, some time before, to constrain the Jews to turn Mahometans.

The tribe of Levi pretend to have maintained themselves at Schiras, where the Persians have a fine academy, a great number of scholars, and professors to teach philosophy, physic, and divinity. It is certain there are many more Jews there than at Ispahan; but we cannot conjecture upon what foundation they pretend to be of the tribe of Levi; nor how this tribe, which returned from Chaldea with Ezra and Nehemiah, has been able to get together in this city to trade in glasses and wine, which is their main occupation. They are still more numerous at Lar, the capital of a province, where they have a quarter assigned them to eat at the foot of the mountain, between the city and the castle. They are also diffused into the country, on the coast of Ormus and Bander Abassi, in order to glean up some little part of the trade that is carried on from thence to the Indies, where they had formerly many brethren. Indeed, they were distinguished there into two kinds; one that were born Indians, who turned Jews, and the others were descended from the race of Abraham. The king of Portugal, though he had expelled them out of his kingdom, tolerated them still at Goa and other places, where they had their public worship.

Bagdad, which was so long the seat of the princes of the captivity, has for a long time been an inconsiderable city. They do not reckon above fifteen thousand inhabitants, since its being taken by Amurath IV. Nevertheless, the Jews maintain themselves here; where they have a synagogue, and at present make a part of its inhabitants: but their number increases considerably every year, by the pilgrimages made to Ezekiel's tomb. This continues among the Jews as well as the Persians; and a multitude of pilgrims arrive annually at Bagdad, and remain there. However, they are mortally hated: and the Rasedis, which make a particular sect among the Mussulmen, and are very powerful at Bagdad, will hold no correspondence with them.

They are said to live more peaceably in Armenia; though their own writers tell us, that the Armenian inhabitants of Melea, having accused them of killing a Christian, because he was seen to go into a Jewish house, and not come out of it again, an information was immediately lodged against them, and the murder being confessed by the accused, they crucified some, and burnt others, not even sparing Abiob, a celebrated physician, whom they cast into the flames. Three days after these executions the Christian appeared, the accusation was found to have been laid out of hatred to them, and the confession to have been wrested by torture. Complaint being made of it to Solyman II. the Armenian magistrates were forbidden from thenceforth to take cognizance of such criminal cases, and ordered to bring them before the sultans. This story, if true, which is taken from an anonymous writer who lived in Egypt, and is entitled, "The Sufferings of the Jews," shews plainly, that if they live quietly among the Armenians, it is rather owing to the protection of the Porte, than to any conformity between them.

We also find some of them in Media, where they were carried at the time of the captivity, and where they have still continued, though declining very much. Chasbin is a great city in Media, which some geographers think to be the same with that which Tobit calls Rages of Media. It is also a place very much enriched by its advantageous situation. Tahamasb made it his capital, and commonly spent the winter in it; and so did his successors, till Abbas I. removed his court to Ispahan. It serves to unite the trade of Hyrcania, Iberia, and Media, with the other provinces of the kingdom. The Jews were carried thither in Sennacherib's time; and there lived Gabael, to whom Tobit entrusted ten talents.

They are not suffered at Scamachia, seated upon the Caspian Sea, a place of great trade; but the Tartars, who bring thither girls and boys, and horses, to be sold, tolerate them out of necessity, and mingle with them for the sake of commerce. We find some of them as far as at the foot of mount Caucasus, which the Arabians thought encompassed the whole earth, so that the sun rose upon one of its points, and set behind the other. It is related, that the prince of Mingrelia pretends to be descended from David. The king of Imaretta asserts the same thing. The ancient kings of Georgia believed it likewise; and the cham of Georgia puts it among his titles, that he issued from this great king by Solomon, his son. But these pretensions indeed are supported by no solid proofs. It is true that there is a synagogue at Afcalzike, a little city situated at the foot of mount Caucasus, which the Georgians had built to defend themselves against the invasions of the enemy, and which the Turks have taken from them.

This is the state of the Jews in all this part of the east; by which it appears, that the tribes, which were dispersed there, still remain in Persia, Armenia, and Media, where they have their synagogues, and are still numerous, since they are in all the trading cities from Bassora and the Indies to Mingrelia. But the tribes are too much confounded to be any longer distinguished: they are ignorant, poor, miserable, and reduced to the vilest offices to get their bread. In fine, they have so little correspondence with their western brethren, as hardly to know any thing of them. About this time shone the famous impostor, named Zabathai Tzevi, who, after practising a variety of the most distinguished artifices, in order to delude the public, was at length detected in his iniquitous designs, and received that punishment he justly merited.

Sapheta peopled with Jews. An academy there. Learned men. Moses Cordoverus. Dominic of Jerusalem. Moses of Trani, and Joseph de Karo. Moses Alscheb. Samuel Ozida. A printing-press set up at Sapheta. Few Jews at Jerusalem.

IT might naturally be expected that Judea should have a greater number of Jews than either Syria or Egypt; but as all its noble streams of milk and honey have been long since dried up, their love for it hath cooled in proportion. Indeed, it is frequently visited by their devotees, who go thither in pilgrimages, as well as the Christians; but few of either sort care to settle in it, since they find it so difficult even to get a tolerable subsistence in that quarter.

Sapheta, or, as the Jews commonly call it, Sapliet, or rather Tzephtheth, in Galilee, is the most populous and noted city that the Jews have in this province. They enjoy many privileges there. This city, situate nine miles from Bethsaida, upon a mountain with three tops, is of most difficult access; and therefore it is sheltered from the incursions of the Arabians, who plunder and lay waste the cities where they can enter. It is also certain they are more numerous and kindly treated at Sapheta, than in all the rest of the Ottoman empire. It has an academy in it, which is grown very famous: and though for many years the oriental Jews have much neglected study and sciences, yet they still keep up professors and doctors here, that are men of repute. Hither they send their children to study, as believing the Hebrew tongue is here taught in its purity; as if that language was annexed to the Holy Land, and that the doctors who teach it, and are often strangers, spoke it better than other rabbies. But it is the common prejudice; and the academy of Sapheta has been, for some ages, what that of Tiberias was before, to which it has succeeded.

In this academy taught the most famous casuist that has appeared since Simon Jochaides. He was born at Corduba, which gave him the name of Moses Cordoverus; but quitting Spain, towards the end of the thirteenth century, he was one of the pillars, and, perhaps, one of the first founders, of this academy.

Dominic of Jerusalem taught in the same academy for some time. He became doctor after he had finished his course of studies, and read lectures upon the Talmud. His profession of physic, he practised at the same time, made him better known than the titles of Rau and judge that were given him. The sultan invited him to Constantinople, to be his physician. He lived to the beginning of the last century, and turned Christian; translated the New Testament into Hebrew; and, at the same time, answered some objections of the rabbies against St. Stephen's martyrdom.

Few have done more honour to this academy than Moses of Trani, and Joseph de Karo, who had the conduct of it about the middle of the sixteenth century. The one was born in a city of Apulia, and taught with so much success at Sapheta, that the Jews called him the "Light of Israel, the Sinaitite of Sinai, the Doctor that plucks up Mountains," because he resolves the difficulties that are raised upon the law. The title of his book manifests, that it is an abstract of the Jewish civil law; in which he goes to the fountain head of the laws, and distinguishes betwixt those that proceeded from Moses, and others that had been handed down by oral tradition; and a third sort, which are founded only upon the decisions of the rabbies.

Joseph de Karo was a Spaniard, and went into Galilee, where he died in 1575. He also explained the law of the nation with so much applause, that he was called the Prodigy of the Universe.

This academy has not always been governed by strangers, but had doctors of its own growth. Moses Alscheb was born in this city, and distinguished himself in the seventeenth century, not only by the eloquence of his sermons, but the commentaries he composed upon a part of the law. All the titles of his works are metaphorical; one is called the Eye of Moses; another, the Rose of Sharon; the third, the Lily of the Vallies. He is much praised for attempting, in his explication of scripture, to produce something new; and, being more devoted to the old interpreters than the modern, has exactly related their sentiments, even when they favoured the Christians.

Samuel Ozida was another teacher at Sapheta, the place of his birth. He explained Jeremy's Lamentations, and intitled his commentary, the Bread of Tears.

Moses de Nagiara was also a Galilean, though some make him a Portuguese, because of the family of Noghera, which was, and still is, in this country. He taught at Sapheta, and has left a commentary upon the Pentateuch, which the Jews greatly esteem. The Jews had a press there, in which they printed the Ritual, which Moses Gallant, head of this academy, composed in 1560.

Judas Jona, who, after his conversion, became the learned Bartolucci's master, and put him upon the design of his rabbinical library, was born at Sapheta, and took the degree of doctor, or rabbi, in this academy. He was descended of a Spanish family, which, after Ferdinand's expulsion, retired into Tuscany. Pius V. having expelled it from thence, it passed into the east, where Judas Jona was born. Having gone through his course of studies, he came into the west, and determined at Amsterdam the validity of a will, on which depended some points of importance. The sentence which he gave was approved by eighty-seven rabbies of Germany and Thessalonica. The Jews of Hamburg made him afterwards their judge, and assigned him a salary; but he went from thence to Poland, where he turned Christian. He afterwards settled at Rome, and taught Bartolucci Hebrew; who vindicated him from the errors imputed to him. He had so strong a memory, that, if the Talmud had been lost, he could have restored it.

Of all the cities of Judca, there is none where the Jews have subsisted longer, and still continue with greater lustre and security, than at Sapheta. They are more numerous here than at Jerusalem, where they reckon but about an hundred families, who have their chief habitations upon mount Sion. Some of them have employs in the custom-house, and others are secretaries to the governor; but the greatest part is made up of mendicants, who live upon alms. They send in quest of them even to the west, where wealth and learning are retired. It was upon this errand that Jacob Tomerita took a journey to Frankfort and Holland in the year 1684. His father had retired from Portugal to a little town in the Holy Land, bordering on Sapheta, called Tomer. His brethren deputed him to seek something for their subsistence; and, at his return, he undertook to carry Mr. Ludolf's letters to the Samaritans of Gerizim, by whom he was known. Four years after appeared another deputy from the Jews of Jerusalem, who came begging for them, which sufficiently proves their poverty.

2. Jacob.

When Selim took Jerusalem, at the beginning of the sixteenth century, there was a famous rabbi, who composed a book, intitled, the Eye of Israel. This work is a collection of the explications of the law contained in the Talmud. Many doctors had compiled before what related to the questions concerning right and rites, but rabbi Jacob collected the explications of the law that were dispersed in this great book. He could not finish his design; but Levi, his son, who was at least as learned as the father, put the last hand to it.

It was this work that occasioned the commotion of the Sapheta professors. As they were contemplative doctors, they mightily despised these doctrines. They found, in the work of Jacob and Levi, doctors at Jerusalem, things that displeased them. The dispute was violent, and the division great, as long as Levi lived; but the jealousy of the Sapheta professors died with him. His memory was honoured; and his work, which saved the reading of many large volumes, was received with wonderful applause. Leo de Modena endeavoured, in the last century, to perfect it, by adding the opinions of many doctors that were wanting. He gave an index of the passages, that they might be the easier found. He intitled his additions, the House of Juda; and the table, or index, the House of the Bread of Juda.

Modern
Jews.

ETHIOPIA is one of the places where the Jews have been least disturbed. They agree more easily with the Christians of this country, because these latter conform to many of their rites. They eat no swines flesh, and rigorously observe the sabbath. Even their kings fancy themselves descendants from the ancient Jews, and have a lion in their eleutheons, holding a cross, with these words, "The Lion of Judah hath prevailed." In the letters king David wrote to Clement VII. he took these titles; "I David, beloved of God, the Pillar of Faith, sprung from the tribe of Judah, the Son of David, the Son of Solomon, the Son of the Pillar of Sion, and of the Seed of Jacob." A modern traveller, who was well acquainted with the genius and stile of these remote nations, says, that these were not the common titles of the kings of Ethiopia, but that they twelled them upon that occasion, to give greater lustre to their embassy to the pope. The conjecture is probable; nevertheless, it is certain, that the kings of Ethiopia believe themselves the posterity of the Jews, which must render them more favourable to this nation. On the other hand, the Jews in this country have not received the Talmud, nor all that heap of traditions which cloud their religion in other places.

When the Saracens made themselves masters of Ethiopia, the Jews, fearing their persecution, retired and took sanctuary in Abyssinia. They were treated with more humanity than the natives of the country, since an Arabian author asserts, that a general massacre of the inhabitants being resolved upon, they begged, as a bounty of the king, that they might be treated like the People of the Scripture. These scripture people, in the Arabian stile, are Jews. This name is given them in the Alcoran; for Mahomet, speaking of them, calls them the People of the Book, because of the book of the law and the prophets. The Ethiopians therefore desired the same fate as the Jews; and the king of the Arabians granted their request, on condition that they should give themselves a mark on the face, by which they might be known and distinguished.

"The People of the Book," a title given to the Jews.

It is not easy to determine how early the Jews were settled in Ethiopia; but if we may credit a modern traveller, who has been in those parts, there were not any to be found, except upon an high and spacious mountain, inaccessible on all sides but one, and that very rocky, difficult, and dangerous. Here it was that our author tells us they were seated, the top of it having a most delicious plain, of vast extent, full of small brooks, fine fruits, and excellent pailurage, where they live in plenty of all things, without ever coming down, or having any communication with the inhabitants of Abyssinia. Here it was that Claude, the son of David, being driven by his brother Goranha, king of Adel, took refuge, and was received by the Jews with open arms, and defended by them with such bravery and faithfulness against the forces of the latter, that they obliged them to retire; for which brave action they enjoyed his protection and friendship, after he had ascended the throne, during his whole reign.

Their fidelity to king Claude.

Oviedo, whom Julius III. had made patriarch of Ethiopia, with hopes to re-unite this kingdom to his see, and was sent into this country to no purpose, says, that the Jews possessed great inaccessible mountains; that they had dispossessed the Christians of many lands which they were masters of; and that the kings of Ethiopia could not subdue them, because they had but small forces, and it was very difficult to penetrate into the fastnesses of their rocks.

They still preserved that independency at the beginning of the last century, which sometimes rendered them formidable to the kings of the Abyssinians. For, indeed, they possessed at that time near three provinces: but Sulneus, who then reigned, and was a bold prince, having defeated some idolatrous nations, called Gallas, among whom he had been educated, carried the war even into the rocks of the Jews with so much vigour as to drive them out. They were obliged to abandon the provinces they had possessed, and to disperse themselves over the kingdom. Some retired towards the springs of the Nile, near the Cafrees, where they still subsist. Others remain in the province of Denobe, where they apply themselves to the woollen and iron manufactures, which being odious to the Abyssinians, they leave it to the Jews, who undertake to furnish them with all warlike instruments. They have there their synagogues, and public worship, in which they use the Talmudic Hebrew, though they have not received that collection of traditions. Lastly, great numbers follow the court of the king of the Abyssinians. An Arabian, who had travelled in that country at the end of the last century, assured Mr. Ludolf, that sixty thousand of them were at court. They correspond with the Christians, and live very familiarly with them in that country.

Live independent of him.

Egypt, bordering upon Ethiopia, has served them for a sanctuary. They were very near the brink of destruction in the year 1524, but Providence delivered them by an unexpected revolution. Achmed, to whom Solymán II. had entrusted the government of Egypt, revolted against him, and resolved, at the same time, to make himself master of his new subjects jects estates. The soldiers had already begun to plunder the Jews houses, ■ being persuaded they might do all things safely at the beginning of the rebellion. Achmed, resolving to enrich himself, taxed this nation two hundred talents. They represented their inability, and only brought fifteen talents to the treasury. Achmed, enraged at this refusal, ordered all to be committed prisoners that had not paid the tax. The very moment that Sodus, one of his officers, was executing his orders, news came of ■ conspiracy against Achmed, who having been surprized in the bath by a plot, was obliged to fly with nine men with him; that he was pursued by an army of Circassians; and that it was impossible for him to escape his enemies. He was actually taken; and peace and tranquillity were restored to the city of Cairo. The Jews being delivered, made ■ great entertainment, and called the feast they celebrated in memory of this event, Neffim; because this word signifies a miracle, and the stake to which Achmed's head was affixed.

Moses Alefcar, or the Red, appeared a little after. From his name it is thought that he was of the family of the Rubeis, that was famous in this nation. He declared for Moses the Egyptian, or Haramban, that is, Maimonides, and confuted those who had written against that learned rabbi.

Jews rule powerful in Egypt.

The liberty which they have enjoyed in Egypt rendered them considerable. Their mechanics were dispersed over the country, and in all the cities: but their richest and most creditable dwelt at Cairo. In fine, they pretended to be more numerous in this country than when Moses led them out of it: but this number is of late lessened, for travellers affirm, that they have no settlement except at Cairo, and the maritime cities of Egypt; and that they are so far from being in other places, that if their business obliges them sometimes to go thither, they are forced to disguise and conceal themselves, because the country people abuse as soon as ever they discover them.

In other parts of Africa.

There are some in other parts of Africa. It was a Jew of this country that enabled Muley Archey, king of Taflet, to make war against the prince of Quiveane, to whom he fled for sanctuary. For going to the castle of Dar Michal, upon pretence of visiting the governor, he seized the citadel, and began to manifest his revolt: but he must have miscarried, had he not found a Jew immensely rich, whom he stripped of all his treasures, by means whereof he assembled the inhabitants of the province, was elected king, and dispossessed his brother, then king of Fez and Morocco. He acknowledged the service the Jew had done him, by granting the nation the same liberty it had enjoyed, and making Joshua Ben Amossech prince of it. Muley Ishmael, brother to the king of Taflet, and his successor, had still greater obligations to them; for, in recompence for Don Joseph de Toledo's services during his disgrace at Miquenez, he not only made him one of the first officers of his household, but sent him to the courts of several princes to negotiate with them: and it was he who concluded the peace with the United Provinces in the year 1684. This prince continued the offices to the son, who enjoyed the same honours as his father.

Betray Oran
to the Spaniards.

They had likewise been a long time settled at Oran, and were entrusted with some of the most important offices in that city; yet such was their fidelity to the Spaniards, notwithstanding the treatment they had received, that they were the very people who betrayed it to them; if it was not rather their avarice, and the great sums with which Cardinal Ximenes bought their perfidy. However that be, they have continued very faithful to them ever since. When the town was in great danger, from their neighbours, of being retaken, the Jews resolved to lose their lives in its defence; and when the garrison threatened to revolt, at another time, for want of pay and provisions, they suppressed it by a timely supply of both. All these services, however, did not prevent their being banished from the place in the year 1669; but on what account it is not easy to determine.

Banished

They had likewise been very numerous and flourishing in the province of Suz, which formerly depended on the kingdom of Morocco, but has since been dismembered from it. They had, in the capital of that principality, a very rich and sumptuous synagogue, served by several priests and officers. They had their judges and interpreters of the law, that were maintained at the charge of the people, who live by traffic and labour. There are great numbers of them in the mountains of Morocco, who are employed in the iron manufacture, building, and other laborious employments, to which the inhabitants are averse: but this employment does not hinder others from trying their fortunes at court, and raising themselves to eminent posts. One of that nation, named Pacheco, was sent ambassador to the United Provinces at the beginning of the last century. Some time after their synagogues having been demolished in the kingdom of Fez, Muley Mahomet not only caused them to be rebuilt as soon as he came to the throne, but made one of that nation his high treasurer and prime minister.

THE Jews have, for many ages, preserved their liberty and great privileges in the territories of the grand seignior, not excepting Constantinople itself. They inhabit ■ considerable suburb, which was called Jewry in the crusading days, because they had been settled there ■ long time. The ambassadors of foreign princes reside amongst them. They have at present thirty synagogues; and an hundred and five thousand families in this city and the neighbouring villages. They are allowed the privilege of selling wine; which is the more considerable, ■ theirs has the preference to that of the Christians; because the law of Moses, condemning mixtures, it is imagined that the Jews dare not adulterate it, and that they sell their wine in its purity.

Trade and privileges.

They are here, as every where else, much addicted to trading and usury. Nevertheless, it often happens that poverty makes them turn Mussulmen. It has been said that they are required to espouse Christianity first, as a preliminary to Mahometism; but this is without foundation. They are not circumcised, because they already wear that mark of the covenant; nor are they baptized to make them Christians. Having enquired into the motives of their change, they are made to pronounce these sacred words, which it is not lawful, upon pain of being burnt, to utter without becoming Mussulmen. "La Illah Illalah Mehomet Refoul Allah: There is ■ but one God, and Mahomet the prophet."

The Christians charge the Jews with the murder of Bajazet II. They say that Selim, his son, apprehensive of being excluded the empire by his father's preference of Achmed, rebelled against him. He lost the battle, but failed not, after his defeat, to gain the janisaries to his interest, so that Bajazet was obliged to quit Constantinople, and retire to Demoticha, the place of his birth: but he died by the way, because a Jewish physician, suborned by Selim, gave him poison in the bath, and he expired.

Another of this nation, called Michsez, is accused of having put Selim II. upon the conquest of the isle of Cyprus, and occasioning the ruin of this fine kingdom. It is said that this man, being enraged at the refusal of the Venetians to receive ■ great number of refugee-mariners, who were desirous to leave Portugal and Spain, or else at the punishment he had received for some crimes, retired to Constantinople. His riches obtained him admittance to court; and being resolved to take vengeance of his ■ old old masters, he extolled to Selim II. the beauty of the island, called, The Country of the Blessed. He also cried up the excellency of the wines, of which Selim II. was a great lover, notwithstanding the law forbade their use. He represented, that the Venetians, who were masters of it, made incursions into Syria, and disturbed the passage of the caravans to Mecca. At length the unfortunate blowing up of the magazines of powder at Venice contributed to Selim's determination. One day, in his cups, he promised Michles, or Michlez, the crown of Cyprus, as a reward for putting this design into his head. Nicosia, one of its principal cities, was taken. Famagusta submitted the next year; and the island was hereby reduced. Michles was not made king, as was promised; but his nation had greater privileges granted them in the island [which they still preserve] than the Christians. Selim did more; for he sent a Jew, called Salomon Rophe, to Venice, when the Christians had won the battle of Lepanto, to negotiate with the republic, and conclude a peace.

The Jews obtained, a short time after, the liberty of having a press at Constantinople. It was a new sight for the Mahometans to see books printed, and they were alarmed at it. The Musti was afraid lest the Alcoran should be printed; and lest the love of the sciences, which would hereby grow easier, should be propagated from the Jews to the Arabians. This was a great advantage to the whole nation; for the copies of the law, which were grown very scarce in the east, were universally dispersed; and people applied more earnestly to the study of the law, because the reading was more easy, and they had greater assistances to understand it.

This produced many learned men, and illustrious heads of synagogues. Solomon Japhe, who had left his native Germany, came thither soon after. He explained the Talmud of Jerusalem, and rendered it more compleat, by adding some necessary illustrations. He published two other works, which he call Fair in the Eyes; and, Fair in the Look; alluding to his name, which signifies Fair. The one contained sermons; and the other the explication of Middrush Rabba upon the Pentateuch.

Gedaliah, who pretended to be of the race of David, chose also to leave his father, and his birth-place, Lisbon, to come and practise physic at Constantinople. But as most of the Jewish physicians are also doctors, he taught the rites and laws of his nation. He was made head of the synagogue, and laboured to reconcile the Caraites and the Rabbinites. He says, that the Caraites desired him to instruct, and bring them over to the synagogue: but whether the Rabbinites were too prejudiced, that they thought the affair too nice, or that the Caraites returned to their former opinions, the reconciliation was not effected; and the latter only reaped the advantage enjoyed at Constantinople, of printing books; for they published some of their works, which nevertheless are very scarce.

The last we shall mention is Mardochai: he was son of Eliezar, and took the title of Constantinopolitan, though he commonly resided at Adrianople. He explained the grammar which Aben Ezra published, with the title of Jesod Mora, the Foundation of Fear.

There are some cities of Greece where the Jews have not the privilege to settle themselves; such is the city of Salome. The inhabitants, who are at present Turks and Greeks, hate the Jews so much, that they will not suffer them in their territories. They have the same usage at Athens, where they settled in St. Paul's time. Perhaps, as the number of Christians is there greater than that of Turks, who are more inclined to toleration, the Christians have obtained an order that excludes the Jews from this city.

But if they are denied access in some places, there are many others where they have still considerable establishments. They have four synagogues at Patras, and their own judges here, which they chose from among themselves. They have also their particular burying-place upon a neighbouring mountain, which looks like a great city, because it consists of several little stone houses, in which each family is buried; and a marble stone, on which the name of the family the tomb belongs to is engraved, serves as a door. But as there are but few inhabitants in this city, the Jews, which are not above a fourth part, amount only to about a thousand persons. They are settled at Lepanto, Livadia, Corinth, and other cities, where they live by commerce. But Greece is so depopulated by the revolutions it has undergone, by the tribute it pays, and still more by the oppressions of the grand seignior's officers, that their condition is become very miserable.

They fare much better at Theffalonica, where we find them settled ever since the time of St. Paul, and where they have had a considerable academy for some centuries, as well as a printing-house, which last was since taken from them. Here flourished several eminent rabbies; and hither the Jews send their children from Constantinople to be taught the Hebrew tongue.

They have continued and still subsist at Gallipoli, a city seated in the Thracian Chersonesus, at the mouth of the Propontis; and at this day they make one fourth of its inhabitants, which consist of six thousand Jews, as many Greeks, and twelve thousand Turks. They are more considerable at Proussia, built upon an hill of Mysia, near mount Olympus. This city was the capital of the Ottoman empire before the taking of Constantinople; and as they could not master it but by the destruction of an hundred thousand Christians, who vigorously resisted the Mahometans, they are not permitted to live in it, but confined to the suburbs, whilst they number twelve thousand Jews within its walls. There has been found here an ancient medal, struck in honour of Marcus Aurelius, having on the reverse a man forcing himself upon his sword; and it is said to be the figure of Ajax, who killed himself in this city.

The Jews have also their habitations at Rhodes. They had formerly a district assigned them near the wall, called, "The Wall and Quarter of the Jews:" and when Mahomet II. besieged the place, the Basha, who could not carry either St. Stephen's Mount, or St. Nicholas's Tower, erected a battery of his heaviest cannon against this wall. It was a violent assault, and the quarter was taken. Some nations were already caballing to oblige the grand master to surrender; but he sustained the assault, and repulsed the enemy, though he had received five wounds. The Turks raised the siege; and, to preserve the memory of this event, the grand master, d'Aubusson, erected a church near the wall where he had beaten the Turks. Some time after he resolved to expel all the Jews, not only from their quarter, but the whole island, and from all the estates of the order. The better to authorize his violence, he represented to the council, that the commerce between Jews and Christians was dangerous; that, according to the opinions of divines and canonists, the Jews were all slaves of Christian princes; from whence he inferred, they had lost the natural power of fathers over their children, and that they might be baptized whether they would or not. The Jews were allowed to sell their effects in forty days time; but when that term was expired they were obliged to depart. They were prohibited going and settling in the Levant, for fear they should become spies to the grand seignior; as if they still preserved any authority over those they had banished. In fine, they detained all the children, which they caused to be baptized, and kept at the expence of the church, lest leaving the island, they should resume their old religion.

Rhodes, however, having been taken by the Turks, the Jews settled there again; and they are even treated more favourably than the Christians; for the latter, who have their warehouses and shops in the city, are not allowed to lodge in it; whereas the Jews are not obliged to quit their houses to seek beds in the neighbouring villages. But they reckon but two hundred of them to thirteen hundred Turks.

Jews persecuted by pope John XXIII.

THE Jewish writers complain that they had a terrible enemy in John XXIII. and affirm, that this pope, who was fitter to make a general, and to head an army, than to be head of the church, was their violent persecutor. He issued many edicts to force them to turn Christians: and not content to persecute them in his own dominions, wrote to the queen of Spain, who was regent in the minority of John II. that this princess, acting in conjunction with him, might make the greater number of profelytes; and this she did with such severity, that she forced sixteen thousand Jews to abandon their religion. Part of those that persevered perished by the fire, and part by other punishments to which they were sentenced; while others, that fled, fell into the peasants hands, who murdered them. A very small number of them ransomed their liberty and lives by money. Not long after, they had the pleasure of hearing that their persecutor was reduced to a more desperate state than themselves.

Protected by pope Nicholas II.

Nicholas II. consoled the Jews of his territories for the afflictions they had undergone, and granted them his protection. He suppressed the inquisitors, who continued to torment them unreasonably. He wrote likewise in his turn to Spain, to prevent, by his remonstrances, the forcing of their consciences; and maintained the voluntary converts in the privilege of entering into offices, which the inhabitants of Toledo had taken from them by a solemn edict.

A new storm against them

They had not enjoyed the fruits of that pontiff's patronage many years, before a new storm arose from another quarter. Sextus IV. had been prevailed upon to canonize the little Simon, supposed to have been murdered by the Jews in the city of Trent, in a most cruel manner. They still shew in that city a knife, a pair of pincers, and four large needles, with which they had let out his blood; and two silver tumblers, out of which they had drank it. The whole tragical story is painted at full length in a corner of one of the churches dedicated to the little saint.

This canonization drew great calamities upon the Jews, not only in the bishopric of Trent, where they pretended the crime was committed; but also in all the territories of the republic of Venice. The preachers inflamed the people, who, wrought on by the notion of a false miracle, plundered and murdered all the Jews they met with. So great was the disorder, that the doge and senate were obliged to suppress it, and order the magistrates of Padua to treat the Jews like their other subjects, and prevent their being abused; because the report spread at Trent to them appeared a falsehood, contrived by art, for a certain end the senate would not examine into. They were all banished out of the city of Trent, where the magistrates were less equitable. But some time after they obtained the liberty of tarrying three days, because they carried on a considerable commerce. We are told that, some time after, the three days liberty were reduced to three hours, as a punishment for their obstinate defence of Buda against the Christians, in the last war with the Turks.

Alexander VI. instead of persecuting, received them with abundant cordiality. Being expelled Spain by Ferdinand the Catholic, and becoming fugitives, all those that came to Rome were ill-treated by their cruel brethren, who would have suffered them to die with hunger, if he had not succoured them.

In effect that pontiff, though a Spaniard by birth, and head of the church, understanding that the Jews, who had long been settled at Rome, left the exiles in misery, without attempting to succour them, threatened to expel them, unless they altered their conduct, and gave their miserable brethren opportunities of settling in the ecclesiastical state. He thought it expedient to profit by Ferdinand's error, and to enlarge his revenues at the cost of others. There have been many who would not persecute the Jews, nor yet suffer their numbers to multiply in their states, by the conjunction of strangers. But the pope attended not to the reasons dictated by his religion, but would have the new comers have the same privileges at Rome with the old inhabitants.

Amongst those whom that pontiff's kindness had invited to Rome, was the learned R. Jochanan, a German, who came from Constantinople, and was taken into the service of Picus, count of Mirandola, as his preceptor. This prince, for many years, had been fond of the writings of the rabbies, and even of the casuists. He is reported to have said, that those who read the Hebrew books drew at the Fountain-Head; that the rivulets had flowed from thence to the Greeks; and that nothing but marshes and stagnate water were found among the Latins. He maintained that Esdras had caused certain casuistical books to be written, which he had purchased at a great price; and that Sextus IV. had ordered them to be translated into Latin.

Another part of the Spanish and Portugal refugees thought to find a retreat at Naples; but the inquisitors pursued them there with such rancour, and exercised such terrible oppressions under this pretence, that the people rebelled. The viceroy resolved to expel the Jews, that he might at once get rid of the inquisitors. He alledged, that the contagion having ceased, and the faith of the old inhabitants being pure and well known, there was no need of these cruel physicians, who made wounds, and laid them open, instead of closing them. His conduct was authorized afterwards by Charles V. who would not tolerate the Jews in his kingdom, nor in Sicily. The truth is, this prince hated them; and the impostures he had discovered seem to justify him in it.

This aversion, however, did not discourage one Ricci, a converted Jew, from dedicating to that monarch his celebrated treatise on what he titled Celestial Agriculture. He was a physician in Germany, and produced fifty theorems and expositions of some points in theology; but it will be apparent to those who read them, that they deserve not those encomiums which some learned men have made on them; on the contrary, that they are far beneath the dignity of a sound and reasoning diviner.

The

Jews powerful under Paul III.

The Jews were become so powerful under the pontificate of Paul III. as to provoke the rage of cardinal Sadolet. He was bishop of Carpentras, in the diocese of Avignon, where the Jews had ever been tolerated, since Joan, queen of Sicily, made a present of this city to the pope. They had their synagogues there, as they have at this day; though the city is in the midst of France, from whence they were banished. The prelate, not able to bear it, wrote to cardinal Farnese, representing, that the pope had never been such a benefactor to the Christians as he was to the Jews: that he had granted them titles, new privileges and honours, which rendered them haughty and insolent; insomuch that the Christians were but like sheep in the midst of wolves: that they were driven from their houses, and even commonly from the cities where they ought to live at rest: that it was unaccountable, how a pope could so rigorously persecute the Lutherans, and grant, at the same time, so partial a protection, and such singular favours, to the Jews, who seemed more worthy of his indignation. He observed, that the true method for a man to make his court, and to rise to ecclesiastical dignities, was to countenance this nation. He laid open the real source of this protection, and pointed out that this favour proceeded from the pope's treasurers, and the intendants of his finances, to whom the Jews were necessary men. However, some regard was paid to the cardinal's remonstrances; and, in this case, they did what is commonly done at Rome, when any abuse is discovered that tends to pecuniary purposes, they palliate it, and retrench its too manifest and glaring enormity.

The Talmud burnt.

Some time after Julius III. being persuaded the allegorical interpretations of the Gemara were dangerous, caused the Talmud to be burnt; so that all the books of the Gemara, which were in Italy, according to the Jewish writers, were destroyed.

Learned men and works at Rome.

It was in this pontificate that Joseph Tzarphati, a famous rabbi, who had taught a long time at Rome, embraced Christianity. He was born in France, but retired into Italy, where he explained the Talmud in the synagogue and the academy of Rome; and, to do more honour to pope Julius, took the name of Monte.

There were, moreover, at this time, other famous Jews at Rome. Elias, the Levite, was born at Padua; but having lost all, when this city was taken, he was received by some cardinals, whom he taught Hebrew. Being an unfortunate man, he once more suffered, when the constable de Bourbon plundered Rome. He retired to Venice, and from thence to Germany; but being unaccustomed to the cold air of that country, he returned to Italy, where he died at eighty years of age. He was suspected to have great inclination for Christianity, and this suspicion was a ground sufficient for his nation to hate him; but he did not abjure the faith of his ancestors, though some have believed and affirmed it.

There was a woman at Rome, called Deborah, who then began to distinguish herself by her poems and other works. She died in the beginning of the seventeenth century.

Paul IV. two years at the death.

Paul IV. declared himself an enemy to this nation, and the first year of his pontificate issued two bulls, of which the Jewish writers vehemently complain. By the first he ordered each synagogue in his territories to pay ten ducats annually for the instruction of the catechumens who should abjure Judaism; and by the second, which was more rigorous, obliged the men to wear a yellow hat, and the women a veil of the same colour. He compelled them all to live in the same quarter of the city, the gates whereof were to be shut at night. They were deprived of all societies, offices, or professions among the Christians, without excepting physic and merchandize; for their commerce was confined to small wares; and they were forbid having more than one synagogue in each city. They were commanded to sell all their lands within six months, a circumstance which so lowered the price of them, that they could not get the fifth part of their value.

No. 52.

The cardinal Charles de Boromes, bishop of Milan, not only enacted several canons against them in the first council he held in that metropolis, much of the same kind with those of Paul IV. before-mentioned, but desired all the Christian princes to do the same, and all this to promote, as much as possible, their conversion. But that edict shews, at the same time, they were become so numerous and powerful, that there was some reason to fear them, not only at Milan, but in other places of Italy, unless they were confined to their own separate quarters, and interdicted, as much as possible, from all kind of converse with the Christians.

Council of Milan acts against them

Pius V. was still severer towards the Jews; and the Constitution he published against them was sufficient to render them odious to all the world; for he accused them of hating the Christians; of ruining the ecclesiastical state by the exorbitant usuries they drew from it; of sheltering robbers, and thereby promoting theft; together with a train of various other vices. They were also charged with dealing in magic, and foretelling things to come, and for these reasons were expelled all the cities of the ecclesiastical state, except Rome and Ancona.

Banished by pope Pius V. out of the ecclesiastical state.

Sixtus V. acted more frankly towards them, and candidly owned that the advantage he reaped from them was the chief motive of his tolerating them. A rabbi, called Meir, or Magin, of French origin, who resided at Venice, came to Rome, and being a man of address, was very agreeable to the pope. He dedicated a book to him, and wrote verses in his commendation, which were translated into Italian. He at length presented a petition to have the sole privilege of silk manufacture, pretending to have an admirable secret for multiplying the worms. The pope granted him several privileges, and revoked all the contrary declarations and bulls of his predecessors, though they had been made with an oath and menace of excommunication. The hope of enriching himself, by laying a great duty upon every pound of silk, was the motive that induced Sixtus V. to distinguish this Jew from all others, and give him a patent which ruined the rest.

Grants of Sixtus V. to R. Meir.

Clement VIII. shewed them but little favour; for he renewed the bull of Pius V. who banished them out of the ecclesiastical state. Two things are observable in this bull; one, that he added the city of Avignon to those of Ancona and Rome, where they still preserved their liberty of conscience; the other, that this pope founded the privilege of tolerating them at Rome upon this reason, that the Jews ought not to be removed far from Rome, that they might be always at hand to be converted, as if conversions were more frequent at Rome than other places. According to this principle he should have given liberty of conscience to all heretics at Rome, and have filled the city with them, that they might always be at hand to be converted.

Bull of Clement VIII. against the Jews.

This nation had then other considerable settlements in the cities of Italy; but one of the most noted was that of Venice. That republic received them into all its territories, and gave them very hospitable entertainment. They also boast to have in part deserved this kindness by their fidelity, and the great services they had rendered in the war with the Turks, and particularly at the siege of Candia. Here it was that Daniel Bombergue printed their Hebrew bible the first time. This printer came from Antwerp to Venice, and chiefly dealt in Hebrew books. To print them the more correct, he employed the most learned Jews, whom he kept in pay, to the number of above an hundred. Felix Pratensis had the care of an edition of the bible with the Chaldee paraphrases, and the commentaries of many rabbies, which he dedicated to pope Leo X. But this edition is not the best, because he could not regularly dispose the different readings of the Massoreths.

Jews at Venice.

Hebrew bible printed.

Bombergue was likewise desirous of printing a good Hebrew grammar, and R. Abraham de Balmis was ordered to compile one accordingly; but he dying before it was finished, it was afterwards complicated by R. Calonymas, a learned Jew then at Venice. Besides these books, he printed a great number of other works of the Jewish rabbies, for which his memory is still dear to the learned world, especially to the Jews.

R. David de Pomis.

It was to Venice that David (the son of Isaac) de Pomis retired; who, by way of acknowledgment, wrote a treatise to prove, that the laws of that republic are of divine original. This learned rabbi asserted, that his family descended from one of the heads of the captives whom Titus carried from Jerusalem to Rome. He was a prodigy of learning in his tenderest years. His father lived at Spoleto; but the Germans having pillaged Rome, he was afraid of being ruined by the like fate, and therefore carried off all his effects, and went to seek a retreat somewhere else. He fell into the misfortune he sought to avoid; for Colonna's troops meeting the mules that carried his treasure, seized it, and reduced him to extreme poverty. He settled at Bevagna, where his son, who was born in the year 1525, intently applied himself to study. The manuscript of one of his ancestors, who lived in the beginning of the twelfth century, and who had then composed an Hebrew dictionary, accidentally fell into his hands. He not only studied it, but resolved to make another larger, in which he inserted the terms that the rabbies often make use of, though they are not Hebrew. He inserted into his work all that was valuable from those of Rabbin Nathan, Elias the Levite, and Kimki's roots. In it we find the Hebrew words, and the foreign terms, with the Latin and Italian.

Protected by the Republic of Venice.

The republic maintained its rights in the war with the Uscoques. These robbers often pillaged the merchants of this nation; and the house of Austria pretended to dispute with the Venetians their privilege to protect them, because they were not Christians. But no regard was had to a pretension that deprived sovereigns of the right of defending their subjects; and the Jew, Henriques, was chosen by the senate to go into Dalmatia, to endeavour to accommodate this affair, which caused an unhappy war.

Famous rabbies at Venice.

R. Sichma, since named Simon Luzati, at this time published here his Socrates, in which he shews that the greatest geniuses are weak and wandering when they are guided by prejudice. He composed another treatise concerning the state of the nation. It was at Venice also that Samuel Nachmias lived, though he was of a Thessalonian family. Here he abjured judaism, with David, his son, and part of his family, which took the name Morosini. To shew that his conversion was sincere, he published an Italian treatise, intitled, Via della Fide, or the Way to the Faith; in which he explains the ceremonies of his nation, and shews the usefulness of them; proves that the six hundred and thirteen precepts, which they distinguish in the law, are observed by no body, and confutes all the Jewish superstitions and sects. He died in the year 1687, at Rome, whither he retired. Mardochai Korkos, who taught in the year 1672, performed a task that was no less bold and odious to the doctors of his nation; for he composed a treatise against the cabala; and their prejudices for that science are so great, that all seem to shake the foundations of their religion who attack it; and therefore the doctors have had the precaution not to print it.

Printing at Soncino.

At the same time that Bombergue had his press at Venice, some Jews, from Spire, in Germany, were employed in the same manner at Soncino, a small town in the duchy of Milan, near the river Oglio, where they began to print Hebrew books about the end of the fifteenth century. They quitted the name of their family, to take that of the city of Soncino. Their principal business was to print Hebrew books; and as they were almost the first that did this service to the nation, they grew famous and considerable. By this means they rescued from oblivion a great number of rabbinical writings, which would have been buried in the dust, and were not easily read. The doctors, that hereby found it much easier to read the works of their predecessors, gave great encomiums to the Soncini, which a long time continued in this post, and from thence dispersed themselves into other cities of Italy. There have been also very famous doctors of this name, and R. Ascer was of this family.

There was also a synagogue at Imola, where the famous Gedaliah was born, who was of Portuguese descent. He boasted to be of the family of the Jachia; and maintained that his family, proceeding in a right line from Jesse, father of David, had maintained itself in Portugal, where Athanaric, son to the great Athanaric, first of the name, had given three cities in fief to one of his grandfathers, and made him intendant of his household, and his whole kingdom.

R. Gedaliah

This rabbi had composed 21 volumes; but the principal, and almost only, one which was printed, is, the Chain of the Cabala, or Schialschelet Hak-kabala. He wrote it at Imola, in the year 1549. And though the author stole a great many things from a work like his own, and is very frequently mistaken in chronology, yet he has been serviceable to Bartolucci, in his rabbinical Bibliothek, as he owns himself; and it is one of the most necessary books to those that are fond of the chain of tradition, and the personal succession of the doctors.

At Modena was another synagogue, with R. Samuel at the head of it, who, in the year 1550, published the Judgments of Solomon. We have already observed what pompous titles these writers give their books. This is a course of canon law. Solomon is renowned for the wisdom and equity of his judgments; and the author fears not to give the same idea of himself and his decisions, which are in reality much esteemed.

R. Samuel at Modena

There was an academy at Padua, which also brought up a considerable number of doctors. R. Meir was its president. Joseph of Padua, who took the name of his native place, likewise taught there. Isaac Phea published there, at the same time, his Way of Faith, which acquired him great reputation. They had their great preacher Menachem Rabba, whose sermons upon the four seasons of the year have been since printed by his son. He was living in the beginning of the last century. The Jews were here admitted doctors of physic, and they might afterwards practise in the territories of the republic. They have moreover three synagogues, eight hundred persons of their nation, and a considerable ghetto. This is the name in Italy they give the streets and quarters of the Jews, in which they are shut up at night.

Rabbies at Padua.

The synagogue and academy of Mantua have been famous for a long time. Two rabbies, Meier Leone di Mantua and Kolon, who governed it at the end of the fifteenth century, were divided. Jealousy perhaps was the true cause of their enmity; but they concealed this shameful passion under the cloak of religion, and difference of opinions about faith. Not only the Jews of Mantua divided, but the Christians engaged so far in this division as to come to blows. Lewis Gonza, who was then Marquis of Mantua, tried in vain all ways to reconcile them; but at length he took the resolution which is always most effectual, that is, to expel the leaders of the faction, and, by their exile, restore tranquillity to synagogue and academy.

A difference at Mantua

Other doctors succeeded the expelled; and Moses Vecchio, or Moses the Old, made a great figure in the following century. Alphes, whom we have already mentioned, had written a course of law so conformable to the Talmud, that sometimes one is mistaken for the other. His commentators, instead of censuring several things he had inserted in his book, approved them, or endeavoured to soften them by a favourable interpretation. But Moses the Old, setting himself above Alphes and all his commentators, published at Mantua his corrections upon their works, which did him great honour.

The Jews were settled at Pesaro, a very ancient little city, mentioned by Catullus. It belongs at present to the church, and is situate in the duchy of Urbino, upon the Adriatic Sea. Here was born R. Jechiel

R. Jechiel
of Pefaro

R. Jechiel, who, having for some time heard the sermons of an inquisitor at Florence, went to Rome, to desire leave to abjure Judaism. Pope Gregory XIII. was present at the speech he made before a numerous assembly, and received him, as he descended from the chair, with the highest marks of satisfaction. The pope baptized him some days after. He became a preacher; and some of his Italian sermons have been printed, which he preached at Florence.

They have, generally speaking, upheld themselves in most cities of Italy, and have had many learned rabbies during the foregoing century, the most celebrated among whom were the following:

Leo of Modena; his works.

R. Jehudah Arie, commonly known by the name of Leo de Modena, the place of his nativity, as that of Leo (Lion) answered to his Hebrew name of Arie. He was a very learned man, and hath given the world a treatise on the ceremonies of the Jews, which is highly esteemed by the learned of all nations. His book, intitled, "the Mouth of the Lion," is another useful work, wherein he hath judiciously collected and explained all the words used by the rabbies, which are neither quite Hebrew or altogether Chaldee, and hath endeavoured to fix the pronunciation of them so as to be understood by Jews of all nations. He was for a considerable time chief of the synagogue, and reckoned a good poet both in Hebrew and Italian. He wrote several other treatises; and formed the design of translating the Old Testament into Italian, but was forbidden to proceed by the inquisitors; instead of which, therefore, he wrote his Lexicon. He died at Venice in the year 1654, at the age of almost 80 years.

Mardochai
Korkos.

Here flourished, in the year 1674, Mardochai Korkos, who having a better judgment than most doctors of his nation, instead of giving into the tenets of the cabala, has endeavoured to make others dislike it. He even had the courage to write against the famous Sephiroths, which shews his good taste for theology.

Jacob Tza-
halon.

Jacob Tzaphalon taught at Ferrara. He was born at Rome in 1630, and had also taken his degree of doctor of physick in the university of this city; but bent his studies to the law, and became one of the principal doctors of the last century. Being rendered uneasy in his native country, he forsook it, and retired to Ferrara, where he governed the synagogue of that place. This situation was the more convenient to him, because he came near Venice, where he printed several books. He published a collection of devout thoughts, to which he prefixed several prayers. He wrote other books. The title of one is taken from the prophet Micah, "Thou wilt perform the Truth to Jacob." The second is, "The Light of the Preachers." A third, which turns upon physick, is called, "The Theatre of Life;" in which he treats of fevers, poisons, simples, and diseases peculiar to each part of the human body.

Judas Azael

Judas Azael was eminent also for his preaching in the last century. His reputation was so great, that the Christians went out of curiosity to hear him. He published a book, called The Thrones of the House of David. He died at Ferrara in the year 1677.

Jehoshuah
Menahem.

Jehoshuah Menahem was president of the academy at Rome at the end of the last century; and there was another doctor at the same time called Jacob Dattilo delli Piatelli. He came of a distinguished family of his nation at Rome, and was considered as one of the best qualified masters to instruct youth. The R. Tribotti appeared also in the middle of the same century. In a tract which he published, he advanced some propositions that occasioned the doctors of Italy to oppose him. The synagogue and academy of Rome, to prevent the multiplication of books, and the course of the division pronounced upon all these questions, declared for Tribotti, and the other doctors submitting to its decision, peace was restored.

They reckon twelve or fifteen thousand Jews in Rome, who are governed by triumvirs, whom they call Memmonim. These three determine all the differences that arise betwixt man and man, and take care to preserve the privileges the popes have granted them. They are changed every year, in order to prevent the abuse of their authority. The Jews lived so familiarly with the Christians, that the latter made no scruple to go frequently to their synagogues; and they did it in such numbers, that Innocent XI. was obliged to threaten them with excommunication, and a fine of twenty-five crowns upon all who entered them. They have an academy here, and their professors also, among whom was the famous Joseph Kimki. They have nine synagogues; and it seems they preserve a kind of superiority over the rest of those in Italy, since they are consulted upon doubtful cases, and their determinations singularly regarded.

ans, but af-

Innocent XI. gave them, some years since, a particular token of his protection. This pontiff, who conjured the king of France to persecute his Protestant subjects, to oblige them to change their religion, induced the Venetians to give liberty to some Jews whom they oppressed. Morosini, general of this republic, returning victorious from the Morea, brought with him from this country many Christians and Jews he had found under the power of the grand seignior. The first were set at liberty, and the latter kept in slavery. They represented the injustice that was done them, since they offered to dwell in the territories of the republic, where they are allowed full liberty of conscience. They have their cemetery at Venice, which has produced some epitaphs. They have also their synagogues, and reckon near two thousand persons of their nation in that city. But yet they could not obtain their desire; and their fate would have been miserable, if the pope, whose protection they implored, had not interposed in their behalf. Not satisfied with acting at Venice, he appointed a congregation at Rome to take cognizance of this affair, and to regulate it; whereupon the republic granted what was demanded, and the Jews were set at liberty.

Pope Innocent XI. favourable to
the Jews.

This pontiff also strove much to promote their conversion. Gregory XIII. had ordered a sermon to be preached weekly to instruct them. An ingenious man was to be chosen for the purpose, who was to prove that the introduction of the gospel had abolished the law; and to enlarge upon the long misery this nation had suffered for a prodigious course of years. He obliged one third of the Jews of Rome to be present, in their turns, at this sermon; and the children who had reached twelve years were registered among the auditors. He built seminaries for the maintenance of the new converts, and hospitals for their sick. But, after all, the greater part remained in unbelief; and cardinal Barberini, who was at a great expence to forward the work, acknowledged, before his death, that such conversions were only feigned and insignificant.

their conversion.

Prove ineffectual.

We have now brought the history of the Jews in Italy to the end of the seventeenth century. Those who desire a more exact knowledge of the number and present state of their synagogues, may consult the tax on those in the ecclesiastical state. They reckon nine at Rome, and nineteen in Campania; thirty-six in the marquisate of Ancona, twelve in the patrimony of St. Peter, eleven at Bologna, and thirteen in Romandiola. These are taxed somewhat above seven hundred crowns, which they pay every year.

Tax on the
synagogues.

We may farther observe the will of Zachary Porto, who died at Florence towards the end of the last century. This merchant had composed a kind of concordance upon the commentators of the Talmud. When he died he entrusted his work with the doctors of Rome, and bequeathed his library to the school. Moreover, he gave twenty-four thousand piasters to his nation; one fourth part to be divided among the universities of Leghorn, Venice, and the Land of Israel; and eighteen thousand piasters to be distributed into portions for Jewish maids, of the synagogues of Rome, Ferrara, Ancona, Urbino, (which was his birth place,) Pefaro, Cefano, in Italy.

Synagogues

Cefano, Venice, Padua, Verona, Rovigo, Florence, Sienna, Pisa, Leghorn, Mantua, Modena, and Reggio. This enumeration shews there is still a considerable number of synagogues in that part of the world, where the church of Rome reigns with the greatest authority.

History of the Jews in Germany, from the fifteenth to the sixteenth century.

Jews in Germany oppressed. Hebrew concordances. Creation of doctors, and origin of the title. Ordinance of the council of Basil against the Jews. Banished Bavaria. Burnt at Mecklenburgh. Banished Nuremberg and Cologne. Victor Carbe's book against them. Simeon a learned Rabbi. Pfeffercorn's advice against the Jews. Reuchlin's opposition. Continuation of the dispute. Pfeffercorn's dissimulation punished. State of the Jews under the reformation. Enmity betwixt Martin Luther and the Jews. They become more wary and learned. R. Isaac's Buttress of Faith. Other Jewish traits in vindication of their religion. Jewish sectaries. Banished from Mersbourg. Protected by Ferdinand and Salomon Lawria. Simon de Guntzbourg a good geometrician. Other learned rabbies. Condition of the Jews in Bohemia. Expelled and restored. Learned men in Bohemia. Jews in Hungary and Moravia. Settled in the territories of Brunswick.

Jews in Germany oppressed.

THE fifteenth century began unhappily in Germany for the Jewish nation. A great many were settled in Thuringia and Milnia. But the landgraves made them pay dear for their quiet and liberty. Whether it was that necessity required it, or they were driven to it by avarice, which prevails in the minds of princes, as well as private persons, but they often demanded considerable sums; and it had not been long, perhaps, that they had paid one great tax, when a new one was demanded of them; and, upon their refusing to pay it, they were all committed to prison, and not set at liberty till they paid a considerable ransom.

Hebrew Concordance.

Jacob Movilin at that time made himself famous by the great number of his disciples, as well as by his judicious answers to the questions that were proposed to him. An Hebrew concordance was composed by Nathan, at the beginning of the fifteenth century. Reuchlin printed it, because he found it very useful. There have been several editions of it since; but the best of all is the Roman, the work of a monk, called Marius Calasio; for he not only added the concordance of Esther and Daniel, which were wanting, but we find illustrations upon the Chaldee notes, and upon all that relates to the description of the places mentioned in holy writ.

Creation of doctors, and origin of the title.

There was at that time a dispute among the rabbies of Germany about letters of divorce. Young people were frequently desirous of procuring them; and as they were not perfectly acquainted with the ancient rites, were guilty of errors. In order to prevent this abuse, it was enacted that none but the received doctors should be privileged to draw up these letters, and that all the rest should be void and null; and it is said that this was the origin of the title of doctor, which Movilin assumed. But it was probably pride which gave birth to this new degree of honour. The Christians presented the doctors cap with great pomp in their universities; and to imitate them, the Jews took this title, and began to confer it with some ceremony; whilst the antique one of rabbies was despised. The title don was only used in Spain; but the doctors were distinguished amongst all the Christians. Abravanel, who saw that the Germans ordained their disciples by saying, "Morenu," (you are our doctor,) was sur-prized at this custom; but he found afterwards, that the same thing was done in Italy, where this title soon came into vogue.

The council of Basil, which extended its jurisdiction far and near, thought it ought not to neglect the Jews, who were numerous in this city and in Germany. It commanded, by a decree, the prelates to chuse, in all places where there were Jews, some persons skilled in the languages to preach to them. The prelates were obliged to send all the Jews of their dioceses to this sermon; and heavy punishments were decreed against those who concealed them, or hindered them from receiving instruction. People at the same time were forbid to have any commerce with them at table, or in civil society. It was not allowed to have servants, nurses, physicians, or farmers of this nation; nor to let them houses near churches, or in the bodies of cities; and to discover them the more easily, they were obliged to wear a different habit from the Christians. The council also condemned those who pledged church books, utensils, and ornaments, to lose their money.

Ordinance of the council of Basil against the Jews.

Regulations were made about those who were converted. The new converts by baptism obtained the privilege of enjoying their estates, except what they had acquired by usuries; for they obliged them to restore their excessive interests, if the persons were living; and in case of death, as the church was impropriate of the confiscation of these goods, she made a present of them to the new converts.

The council declared farther, by an edict, the new converts capable of all offices in cities where they were baptized. It could not, indeed, be assured of the sincerity of these conversions; and it appears that it doubted of them; for it forbid that the new converts should have frequent intercourse together; as finding, by experience, that they corrupted one another, and weakened their faith. They were forbid also burying their dead after the Jewish way, keeping the sabbath, and other rites of that nation; which is a sufficient proof that they had not totally renounced them. The parish-priests were ordered to prevent the mischief, by procuring them good matches among the Christians. As the council gave great privileges to new converts, it appointed likewise terrible punishments for hypocrites; for it authorized the priests to keep a strict eye over their conduct, to impeach them to the inquisitors, and to call in the secular arm to punish them with greater rigour; declaring, that all who protected these dissemblers should be treated as abettors of heretics: and carrying its authority farther, it annulled all the privileges which might have been given to the Jews, either by popes or emperors. The council, upon the whole, was right in ordering the Jews to be instructed, and the new converts to be maintained by contribution; but it exceeded the bounds of its power, in setting itself above emperors, and pretending to abolish their laws.

The decrees of the council of Basil caused no great alteration in Germany. It is true Lewis X. duke of Bavaria, expelled the Jews out of his dominions; but it was twenty years after: and the council laid not this injunction upon sovereigns, so that this prince consulted not his own interests. It was vain to represent to him, that the banishment of so many opulent people would lessen his revenues; he ordered them to depart the same day, and the very same hour, from forty cities, and all the towns in his territories: he confiscated their estates, and built prisons, and other public edifices, in the places which had belonged to them.

Banished Bavaria.

The princes of Mecklenburgh also made a dreadful execution of them in their capital city. Thirty Jews were condemned to the fire. One of them threw himself into the river, to avoid the barbarity of this punishment; and, as the women and children were included in this execution, a mother, driven to despair, killed, with her own hand, two of her daughters; and the third would have undergone the same fate, if the Christians had not taken her away. Two years after they were accused, in Hungary, of murdering a Christian, and drinking his blood.

blood. They were put to the rack, to force them to confess that they were not only guilty of the crime, but that their nation partook in it.

about five years after the Jews of Nuremberg, who were both numerous and wealthy, were all banished out of that city, and settled in a small town in its neighbourhood, where they built a synagogue. The citizens had several crimes laid to their charge, in order to justify the severity of their expulsion; but the true motive seems to have been their wealth, which made them insolent; their numbers, which made them formidable; and their usuries, which served to debauch their youth, and rendered them at length universally odious.

At the beginning of the sixteenth century they were expelled out of the diocese of Cologne; and Victor a Carbe, who renounced Judaism to turn priest, expatiated on the praises of the bishop, congratulating him on having purged his bishopric from the people of his nation. At the same time that he uttered invectives against his nation, he counselled the Christians never to dispute with them, because they were accustomed to controversy from their infancy, and that to conquer them, a man had need of a quiver full of arrows. However, he wrote against the Jews; and at this day we read these words upon the gates of the church of St. Ursula at Cologne; "Victor, formerly a Jew, in the year 1509, wrote four books against the errors of the Jews." He was near fifty years old when he was baptized; and it was probably the fear of being banished that produced his conversion. We learn, from his testimony, that the Jews had suffered in the diocese of Cologne in the beginning of the fifteenth century.

About the same time flourished, in the neighbourhood of that city, the great R. Simeon, an eloquent preacher, and author of the famed book Jalkut, (Pouch), which is a judicious collection of such interpretations of the ancient Jewish doctors on the sacred books, as were best and easiest to be understood. This work was printed at Thessalonica, and afterwards in Italy. A rabbi, of the family of Gedaliah, who had retired to Jerusalem, composed a long commentary upon it. He thought his labour was lost, because he was not able to print it; when Dias Mokato, a rich Spaniard, undertook to defray the expence; and therefore it was printed, with Abraham's notes, at Leghorn. The corrector dedicated it to the great duke Ferdinand II. A new Jalkut was afterwards printed at Amsterdam, wherein are collected the literal and mystical interpretation in alphabetical order; whereas Simeon followed the order of the sacred books, and confined himself to the allegorical sense. There is a third, which is that of R. Reuben, and is only a collection of notes upon the Pentateuch.

Some years after this transaction, a proselyte, called Pfeffercorn, kindled a terrible war among the learned of this century. Whether it was to acquire a reputation with the party whose profession he had newly embraced, or rather that he had a mind to enrich himself at the cost of his deserted brethren, he persuaded the emperor Maximilian, that all the Jewish books ought to be burnt, because they were full of fables, lies, and blasphemies. He associated with him two Cologne divines, and, amongst others, the famous Hochstraten, who afterwards wrote against Luther. He was charged with designing to seize all the books he condemned, and afterwards oblige the Jews to ransom them at an exorbitant rate. All the devotees engaged in this faction; and the emperor himself, prevailed on by the authority of the divines, gave a favourable answer to the request presented to him. However, as this affair made a noise, he was willing to know the opinion of some doctors, and particularly of Cappon, or Reuchlin. This professor had studied the languages under Vesselus. Some say he was under the tuition of John de la Pierre, a German, who was afterwards professor at Paris, and became a Carthusian. But it is certain he was indebted for his first erudition to the professor of Groningen, who was called the Light of the World. The duke of Bavaria, who had a great esteem for Reuchlin, having a very nice affair to manage with Alexander VI. chose him for one of his ministers. He continued a year at Rome, where he perfected his knowledge of the Hebrew under a famous Jew, who flourished at that time, called Abdi Ben Jacob Spuon. The emperor had nominated him to be a triumvir of the league of Suadia, made in the year 1489, to investigate the power of the dukes of Bavaria, and he had executed the office for eleven years. It is no wonder, therefore, that this person, celebrated for his learning, and of importance in the empire, was consulted about the fate of the Talmud, and other Hebrew books.

Reuchlin went not into the opposite extreme of his enemies. He alledged, that such books only ought to be burnt, as contained any blasphemies against the Christian religion. But he declared against destroying those which only treated of the tenets, morals, and rites of the Jews. He alledged farther, that the decrees of Germany not being executed wherever the Jews subsisted, it was impossible entirely to suppress the books dispersed all over the world, whereof one single copy was sufficient for the product of new editions. Good sense required that he should argue in this manner, and extend the argument to all the books that were printed and published. Nevertheless, Reuchlin was highly censured for speaking after this manner, and the divines began to persecute the author of this opinion. The understanding a little Greek was not only sufficient at that time to make a man suspected, and the understanding Hebrew to convict him of heresy, but the design of studying this language was sufficient to incur the resentment of inveterate enemies. Cologne espoused the cause of its divines; and the university of Paris also declared for them. The affair was brought before the elector of Mentz; but Reuchlin appearing only by proxy, Hochstraten obtained a sentence, which he caused to be published before the term. Reuchlin appealed from it to the pope, who commissioned the bishop of Spire to judge of the proceeding. Hochstraten, in consequence, was condemned by default, with costs; and inhibitions were given against his continuing his process. The declaration of the divines of Cologne was declared null. However, they caused Reuchlin's book to be burnt.

Not satisfied with these judicial proceedings, Hutten published the Letters of Obscure Men. Paul Jove, who ascribes them to Reuchlin, is mistaken. These letters contained a poignant satire against the monks. The public was well pleased to see them lashed in a sprightly and vigorous manner; and Reuchlin hereby was revenged for the abuses that had been circulated against him. The revenge would have been more compleat, if Hochstraten had died with grief, (as Paul Jove assures us;) but this inquisitor lived ten years after the publication of these satirical letters. Ortuinus Gratius, to whom they were dedicated, endeavoured to repel the attack, by opposing to them the Lamentations of Obscure Men, and the Letters of Famous Men. But this satire prevailed over the apology; at least men of sense ceased to look upon Reuchlin as a Jew, or as an asserter of their tenets.

The affair was judged at Rome; whither Hochstraten went, fortified with letters from princes, and considerable sums of money, wherewith he purchased protectors. He omitted nothing that could contribute to carrying on his cause. He threatened the pope to appeal from his judgment to the council, to reject him as a pseudo pontiff, and to separate from the church, unless Reuchlin, and the Jews he defended, were condemned. Nevertheless, he was forced to be content to have the cause superse'ded; a favour which the pope granted him when he was going to be condemned: for the judges favoured Reuchlin, and would have pronounced against Hochstraten, if a stop had not been put to it by the pope's order. The inquisitor was obliged to return with disgrace. Reuchlin's friends waited for him near Nuremberg, where his enemies would have used him ill, if he had not had notice of their designs. We are told that Hutten, meeting him one day, would have killed him, to punish his violent persecutions of the Lutherans, who began to spread in Germany: but the monk being humbled, represented, that it was scandalous to kill a naked man; and Hutten being wrought upon, desisted from his purpose.

Pfeffercorn's dissimulation punished.

Pfeffercorn, a little after, bore the punishment of his iniquity; for being arrested upon some suspicion, he confessed he had acted as priest for twenty years, without having received orders; that he had had a design to kill the elector of Brandenburg, and his brother, the archbishop of Mentz; and that he had voluntarily poisoned many Christians, by pretending to be a physician. In consequence of these accusations, he is said to have died amidst the most cruel tortures, to which he was condemned.

State of the Jews under the reformation.

Reuchlin had reason to say, that the monks had found such an enemy in Luther, as would give them business enough to oblige them to let him die in peace, and so it actually happened. Reuchlin ended his days quietly. Not only the Jewish books were spared, but the study of the languages was cultivated. The world began to be sensible of the barbarity and gross ignorance of the persecuting monks; and the Jews were no longer accused of those massacres of children, which had drawn upon them so many miseries, and spilt so much of their blood. Idolatry at that time received a terrible blow, and the worship of God alone began to be restored. On the other hand, the Protestants were better skilled in the languages than the monks and divines of past ages had been, and surmounting vulgar prejudices, studied the writings of the rabbies, discovered the mysteries of them, and confuted them upon their own principles. Their example roused the Roman divines, who taking the same method, discovered the system of the Jewish religion. We must not here enter into party considerations, nor over-strain the praise that is due to our divines: they led the way, and the others have followed: they have drawn the people out of barbarity, and the others have rejoiced in this light: they have had their profound doctors in this matter, as well as we; so that we cannot determine whether the Jews have gained or lost by the reformation that ensued.

Enmity between Martin Luther and the Jews

Luther could not agree with their divinity, and has often censured them with that impetuosity of temper that carried him beyond the bounds of moderation. He charged them especially with being cheats; because he had heard the duke of Saxony say, that a Jew had promised to make him invulnerable; but having obliged the impostor to make trial of his art upon himself, the fraud was discovered, and the Jew died of the wound, that was given him. The great cause of their spleen against Luther proceeded from his having hindered some Christian princes from receiving them into their dominions. Moreover the reformation produced abundance of doctors in Germany, who, having thoroughly studied the languages, frequently dispute against the Jews, and prove to them the truth of the Christian religion.

Jews become more wary and learned.

On the other hand, the Jews, being more closely pressed by the Christians, were obliged to exert themselves in extraordinary efforts for their own defence: and it must be confessed that they have produced some learned champions, at the head of whom we may rank R. Isaac, the son of Abraham. He declares that he spent his life in the courts of Germany, near princes, who often favoured him with marks of distinction. His disciple, who has collected his disputes, compares him to the patriarch Isaac, because he bore his name; and like Isaac had two children. This produced a book in two parts; one of which may be compared to Esau, and the other to Jacob. But this does not inform us who the author was, or in what time he lived. He had frequent conferences with Luther's disciples, and it was against them he composed his Buttreis of Faith. This is a most virulent composition, wherein the author affects to examine particular passages of sacred history, and, envious to explode the proofs of it, raises all the difficulties he can against it, and presses them with all possible vigour and bitterness: and with the same heat he confutes, or attempts to confute, the objections of Christians against the Jews. The book referred to, intitled, by the author, Chasuk Emmah, and, by the Latin translator, Munimen Fidei, shews the author to have lived about the beginning of the 17th century. Its editor Joseph, the son of Mordecai, published it after it had remained a long time in manuscript, and was become very scarce. The Portuguese Jews, indeed, got it translated into Spanish, and dispersed it throughout all the neighbouring kingdoms. It was also in high esteem among the African Jews; and it is from thence that the learned Wagenfeil brought it into Germany, and having translated it into Latin, inserted it in his Tela Ignea Satanae; or, "Fiery Darts of Satan."

At the same time was produced a work, intitled, the Nizzachon, or Victory against the Christians. The Jews often give lofty titles to the books they publish against the Christian religion, as pretending they are so many triumphs over it. Wagenfeil published one of these works, which he thought was composed about the twelfth century, because no later rabbi was quoted, which conjecture is very probable. Schickard had determined to translate and confute another of them, which went by the same title, and was composed by Matathias, but death prevented him. A third treatise of the Victory is attributed to Lipman, who lived in Germany at the end of the fifteenth century; for the author informs us, that he wrote about the year 1499. He thought that a long treatise against the Christians would not make so strong an impression on the people's minds, and therefore made an abridgment in verse, which might be easily learned. That abridgment Wagenfeil has published, with a judicious confutation. Bartolucci speaks of a fourth Victory, in which the Jewish religion is defended with thirty-five arguments, and Christianity attacked with forty-two objections, very artfully stated. It is said to be the work of many authors, who all wrote, notwithstanding, in the purity of their language; but they lived since the reformation, as they quote the works of Luther and Calvin.

Other Jewish titles in various languages.

Besides the Jews who set up in Germany against the reformation, new doctors appeared in Transylvania, called Judaizers, or half Jews, by way of stigma. The case was this: Seidelius, one of the heads of this sect, maintained, that the great prophet did not respect the Gentiles, but only the Jews, to whom he had been promised by the same title as the land of Canaan; that is, as a particular privilege to be enjoyed by them alone. He reckoned also sacrifices and ceremonies as rites peculiar to this nation, contributing to the worship of God. But he was persuaded that all religion consisted in the decalogue, which was naturally engraven on the hearts of all men. He made vain attempts to gain proselytes in Silesia, where he was born; but finding it impossible to retrieve his countrymen from their idolatry, he went into Poland, where he had some followers.

Jewish titles.

Another, named Francis David, was called a Judaizer, or half Jew, because he affected some peculiar modes and forms in offering up prayer and solemn invocations.

Amongst them was likewise reckoned George de Novara, who was burned at Bologna for espousing some peculiar tenets: and such were also esteemed some other sectaries, who observed the Jewish sabbath, abstained from blood and things strangled, several of whom suffered, as half Jews, in England and other parts.

The Jews pretended to have been settled at Melsbourg ever since the taking of Jerusalem; but so venerable an antiquity did not secure them from bishop Adolphus's persecutions, who expelled them all from thence at the beginning of the sixteenth century. But they consoled themselves in the safe retreat which they found in other places; for the emperor Ferdinand I. not only protected them, but granted them the privilege of having a prince of the captivity in Germany; and ordered that the chief rabbi rabbi de Wormes should have this preference before all the rest of his nation. They reckon in the catalogue of these princes the famous R. Jakock, of German origin, born at Wormes, esteemed by his nation for his learning, and who left four ingenious sons, who were all presidents of academies, princes of the dispersion, and the admiration of the age. One of them taught chiefly at Fribourg, where there was a school and a synagogue, as in most cities of the empire, and particularly at Vienna, where they had erected a magnificent building.

They had in Austria a more famous man than Jakock, which was Salomon Lawria. He composed the Sea of Salomon, alluding to his name, and called his book a sea because it founded the depth of the Talmud; and he examined particularly the stile and phrases of it. He died in the year 1573.

Simfon, a native of Guntzbourg, which gave him his surname, was a geometrician of repute, and a skilful architect, who, after he had acquired immense wealth, distributed it with a very bountiful hand. Eliezer, a German, had also a boundless reputation. He left Germany for Poland, where he became head of the academy, and of the house of judgment at Posnania. He published two books; one whereof was called the Work of the Lord; and the other, the Addition of Doctrine.

Poland abounded also with learned doctors. Hierdes taught at Cracow, and gathered a vast number of disciples, who came from all parts to hear his lectures. He was devout, perfect, and gave rest to the law in Israel twenty years; that is, he was professor so long. Joseph Letts, born in the same city, wore four crowns; that of priesthood, of the law, of dignity of empire, and of a great reputation. At Cracow there was a synagogue, an academy, a house of judgment, and a great assembly of the Jews. They were dispersed in most of the cities of Poland, where they had extensive privileges. Nevertheless, they sometimes suffered by popular commotions: for instance, their houses were once set on fire at Posnania, and they saw them burnt without being able to extinguish the flames, because they were afraid that the enraged multitude would fall upon them. The populace, indeed, pretended, that a kind of supernatural terror had seized on them, which would not suffer them so much as to draw water, so that all their houses, effects, and books, even that of the law, were reduced to ashes. But, excepting these popular disasters, learning, as well as traffic, flourished among them; and their academies were governed by men of great reputation.

Cardinal Commendon, in his way to Russia, found likewise, in the province of Ukraina, a number of Jews in great credit, who did not enrich themselves, as they do in general, by usury, but by a fair and honest commerce. They cultivated their lands, and applied themselves to the study of physic and astrology; and others farmed the customs and carriage of merchandize. They are not only exempt from wearing marks of distinction, but are even allowed to wear swords, and to enjoy the same posts and employments as the natives of the country.

Bohemia cherished many of this nation. We have already observed, that the Jews were settled there in the tenth century, since they rendered service to the inhabitants against the robbers, and built at that time a synagogue at Prague; this liberty being given them by way of acknowledgment for the victories that had been obtained by their means. In process of time they also erected a college. R. Falk was the president, and the first that began to exercise his scholars in controversies like the Christians: but this method was not acceptable to the sages, nor relished by the people in general. The Jews, whose system of divinity is rather mystical and abstruse, cannot be reconciled to arguments and syllogisms.

They had also their enemies and persecutors here. An almost general conflagration having destroyed one part of Bohemia, the Jews were accused of being the incendiaries, and condemned. Those that escaped the flames were all expelled by Ferdinand, who could no otherwise appease the popular commotion: ten persons only found favour, being allowed the liberty of remaining at Prague: but the incendiaries having been discovered before the end of the year, the Jews were recalled, and settled again in their country.

Another storm fell upon them soon after; for they were suspected of having made prayers at Prague against the Christians. Upon this suspicion they seized all their books, and carried them to Vienna. This loss was an affliction to them, not only on account of their value, which was very considerable, but especially because they were obliged to perform the service viva voce, and by heart, without reading, which subjected them to many inconveniencies. The storm was but short; the books that were taken were restored; and, perhaps, it was only done to oblige them to redeem them. Ferdinand banished them the same year from all Bohemia, only leaving ten families in Prague; but at the same time he permitted them to live in other parts of his dominions, and also restored them a little after. Weidnerus, who was one of their rabbies, had deserted them during this disgrace. He also preached against them in the synagogue at Prague; and he affirms, that he converted many of his brethren.

They had in Bohemia their doctors, who raised the glory of their academies; for Isaac Mehelung taught at the end of the sixteenth century. When he died, he left his son, R. Charam, president of his school. Here it was that the famous Liwa Bitsleer appeared, with whom the emperor Rhodolphus conversed. He founded a famous academy, called Klausé, whither he drew a vast concourse of disciples; and afterwards was made superintendant over all the synagogues of Poland.

Judas Betsaleel, otherwise Leo of Prague, was born in Bohemia, and flourished in the year 1553. He at first governed the academies of Moravia, and was judge of his nation in that country. He came to Prague in the year 1573, where he founded a new academy, in which he taught eleven years with great reputation. However, he left it to go into Great Poland, where he died at the end of the sixteenth, or the beginning of the last, century. He left many books, amongst which there is one concerning the redemption of Israel, wherein he assures his nation of the coming of the great prophet, and doubts not but that he will render the prosperity of his people perpetual. Some time before appeared, in the same city, one Abraham of Prague, who composed a commentary upon the commentaries of Jarki, and who died in the year 1540.

Mardochai Jophi, or the Fair, was also born at Prague. He retired to Poland, where he died in the year 1611, with the reputation of one of the most learned men of his country and nation. It will not be amiss, in order to know his method, to observe the plan of one of his works. He intitled his book, the Royal Garment; which title is borrowed from the holy story, which says, that Mordecai went out from the presence of the king, in royal apparel of blue and white, and with a great crown of gold, and with a garment of fine linen and purple. It is the disposition of the rabbies not only to delight in metaphors, even in their titles, but to seek some passage relating to the name of the author. He has divided his work into ten royal habits, though there were but five that contained an accurate commentary upon another work. The first tract is an habit of purple, in which he treats of blessings and prayers. The second is a white habit, which relates to feasts and the sabbath. The third is a crown of gold, where he discourses of things lawful and forbidden. The fourth is a robe of fine linen and purple, in which he explains the ceremonies of marriage; and the last is the habit of the city of Susan, which rejoiced in the prosperity of the Jews.

Ganz, the Jewish historian, was born at Prague, where he composed his Stem of David, or his chronology from the creation till the year 1592 of the Christian

Christian church. We must not confound this work with another Stem of David we have already spoken of; for the one is a dictionary, and this a chronicle. The author gives it this title because it was the first of his works; for he published afterwards the Buckler and Tower of David; one of which treats of arithmetic, and the other of geometry. Besides, as his history displays the misery of the Jews, and the power of the Christians, he would hereby oblige his readers to remember the branch of David, and to pray for his manifestation. There are three things peculiar in his work: 1. That he begins with the creation of the world, and ascends to the first temple and the patriarchs; whereas the Jews generally begin with the epocha of the Greeks. 2. Though he has often copied the rabbies of his nation that preceded him, yet he hath been more exact, and corrected their errors. 3. He has introduced into his second book several Christian authors; but he is not happy in his choice; and as he departed from the custom of the Jewish doctors, who slight foreign historians, he ought at the same time to have preferred more exact authors, and men of a greater name.

They built, at that time, at Prague, a synagogue equal to those of Poland and Jerusalem: and as Mordechai Meusel had liberally contributed to this great edifice, as well as to the relief of the poor of Bohemia and Polesia, Ganz calls him, "the Wall and Basis of the School, the Head of liberal Souls, the Father of the Poor, the Oak of his People, and the Love of his Brethren;" and with this commendation he ends his chronicle.

State of the Jews in Hungary.

Those in Hungary were greatly diminished towards the end of the 16th century, when the emperor Rodolphus laid a double tax on them, in order to oblige them to quit that country the sooner. He at length compelled them to pay a monthly fine of fifty denarii per head, which it was imagined must have ruined them quite: nevertheless, a great number of them made shift to maintain themselves in it, though a much greater was forced to seek their fortune elsewhere.

In Moravia.

Moravia had also its synagogues. But the Jews suffered a cruel persecution here in the year 1574; for all the professors of their religion were sentenced to the flames; and many were dispatched before complaints could be brought to the emperor Maximilian, who at length took compassion on these poor wretches. They also suffered greatly in Franconia; for some houses of the city of Bamberg being burnt, the Jews were accused of setting them on fire; and at the same time the people entered their houses, plundered their goods, and indemnified themselves at their cost. But, however, there was no one put to death.

Some time after they had the same misfortune at Bonn. Schenk, the Dutch general, and founder of the fort of his name, marching secretly at the head of some troops, had planted a petard at the gate of this city, and, by means of the noise which some swine in the neighbourhood made, approached the gate, blew it up, and made himself master of the city for the Hollanders. He gave the plunder to his soldiers; and the Jews complain that they were partially distinguished in that pillage. However, this misery was common to them with the rest of the inhabitants; but none were killed.

The Jews were afterwards recompensed for these misfortunes, since, at the end of the century, they obtained liberty to settle in the duke of Brunswick's territories. The princes of this house had ever before been persuaded that such an establishment would be disadvantageous; so that the Jewish merchants were not so much as suffered to cross their lands; and when any one was taken, they plundered him with impunity. But their complaints being brought to Henry Julius, duke of Brunswick, he not only granted the Jews liberty of conscience in his territories, but gave them a place in the Lower Saxony, to carry on their commerce; so that there were but few places in all Germany in which they did not traffic at the end of the sixteenth century. The present age, however, seems to be the most happy æra they have enjoyed since their dispersion.

Authority of the Jews in Poland. R. Solomon's conversion, and theological works. Jews at Hamburgh. Favoured by Ferdinand III. of Bohemia. Enmity between the Christians and Jews of Prague. Jews stripped of their privileges in Hungary. In high credit at Vienna. Banished. Recalled. Settled in other parts of the empire. Synagogues pulled down by the French. Numerous and dispersed at Frankfort. Learned men.

THERE is hardly any country in Europe where the Jews enjoy greater liberty, and more invaluable privileges, than in Poland. They have their stately synagogues and academies; and their court of judicature is endowed with singular authority, since it is allowed to determine in civil as well as religious cases. We are told they have had the singular privilege of coining money, because shekels have been found there with an Hebrew inscription; but as the tomb in which they are said to have been found is rather suspicious, we cannot ground upon it a prerogative usually vested in sovereigns alone.

Poland is looked upon as a nursery of learned rabbies, and the country to which the Jews send their youth to study the Talmud, and the rites of their religion. In speaking of the preceding century, we mentioned some rabbies who were an honour to their nation. This kingdom hath produced one man, who not only renounced Judaism, but wrote and published thirty-seven demonstrations against it. His name was Solomon. He had been bound for one of his brethren, and committed to prison, whence nothing could have redeemed him but his conversion to Christianity; so that this circumstance, together with the affected swoln stile in which he wrote, has afforded reason to many for suspecting his sincerity. However that be, he was an excellent casuist, well versed in theological matters, and an able assertor of the religion he professed.

Hamburgh is called a Little Jerusalem. The Jews are observed to have been more tractable in that city than elsewhere; for a great number of them were converted, in this century, by one Edzas, or Edras, who made it his business to instruct and conform them in the Christian faith. A divine of that city once asserted, that if those instructions were armed with some violence, they would become more effectual. But the senate suppressed his immoderate zeal, which tended only to lessen the number of their citizens, and had already caused some popular commotions.

The emperor Ferdinand III. granted them great privileges, because, when the city of Prague was besieged by Carolus Gustavus, who was lately declared generalissimo of the armies of Sweden and Germany, they defended themselves with a surprising fidelity and vigour. The city was already taken, and the garrison called upon to capitulate; but the conqueror having refused honourable conditions, they sustained many assaults with unshaken fortitude. The Jews distinguished themselves in these assaults, and defended their post with a resolution that merited praises and extraordinary privileges.

Rabbi Chagim, or Joachim, deceived the Christians of this place by a piece of profound dissimulation. After committing a considerable robbery, he embraced Christianity to wipe off the scandal of his crime; and composed a very virulent book against his ancient brethren. He went to Vienna, and introduced himself into the court of Ferdinand, who afforded him his protection. Some time after, perceiving his fortune on the decline, with the help of two other Jews, as accomplices, he robbed the imperial treasury. The criminals were quickly apprehended, and condemned to death. Ferdinand conversion of Chagim.

Francis Angleberg (for this was the name which the convert had taken in his baptism) dissembled till he had lost all hopes of saving his life; but upon the scaffold declared that he never had been a Christian, and that he lived and died a Jew.

In the same place was exhibited an instance of their hatred for the Christians; for one Lazarus, an inhabitant of Prague, understanding his son desired baptism, fell upon him and killed him. He was committed to prison, where, animated by despair, he strangled himself with the assistance of another Jew, who was in the same place. This latter was condemned to be broke upon the wheel.

It appears, from various circumstances, that no considerations have been capable of creating a tolerable good understanding between the Christians of Prague and the Jews. On the contrary, they hate one another; and as it must be confessed, the Jews have occasionally been guilty of such enormous deeds as must render them not only suspected, but odious to the Christians, so likewise it must be granted, that the Christians have subjected them to conformity to some practices that were incompatible with their profession, and of course productive of dangerous commotions. Nevertheless, they are so numerous in this country, as to fill, of themselves, the third part of the city of Prague; but they are poor and miserable, flock about strangers, and submit to the meanest services to obtain a living.

They had enjoyed in Hungary the privilege of farming the revenue, till Ferdinand II. took it from them by an edict, notwithstanding which they found means to preserve the advantages of it, since Ferdinand III. was afterwards obliged to deprive them of it by a new edict, which condemned those to the loss of their places, who admitted the Jews into any of them, alledging, as the cause, "That they have neither conscience or honesty, and are therefore unworthy to enjoy the privileges of Hungary." However, they continued there still; not only under the protection of the grand seignior in those parts under his dominions, but in those of the empire.

About ten years after, they were in such credit in Vienna, that the rabbi Zachary obtained them liberty to build a stately synagogue there, and to add an academy, to revive the study of the sciences, which seemed extinct in this country. He had settled a pension for twenty-four persons, who were to read the Talmud every hour, day and night. One relieved the other; so that the school was always open, and never found without a doctor. But this building, however, was scarce finished, when the emperor drove all the Jews from his capital, seized the synagogue, and turned it into a church. They complain, that the superstitious empress, imagining the toleration the court gave the Jews occasioned her barrenness, pressed the emperor to banish them; but after the death of this princess they were restored to Vienna. The emperor had a new subject of discontent against them in the Turkish war, because they assisted the infidels to maintain the siege of Buda, and distinguished themselves by their valour. But this was in reality an act of fidelity they owed their sovereign; and though this resistance rendered them odious, not only to the people of Germany, but Italy, where they rose against them, yet we cannot condemn them, since they were then subject to the Ottoman empire. Upon the whole, the emperor favours them at Vienna, admits them into affairs of state, and gives honourable titles to those who are employed, or purchase them. The people, indeed, jealous of the riches they heap together, endeavour sometimes to strip them by violent tumults and commotions.

They are numerous and flourishing in Servia, Croatia, Moldavia, Valachia, and in the rich cities of Germany. If they have been expelled Nuremberg, they are spread abroad in the country towns, and have their synagogue at Ffurt, which is in the neighbourhood.

In the city of Augsborg they had formerly a synagogue and academy, and their doctors and disciples were maintained by the rich merchants of the place. But they have since been banished from it, and must buy the liberty of coming into it, at the price of a florin for every hour they stay in it.

It would be tedious to enumerate all the cities where they still subsist without any considerable change in their condition; we shall therefore only attend to those that deserve most notice.

A modern traveller reckons thirty thousand Jews at Frankfort, where they are often plundered, and reduced to the slavery of being water-carriers, to extinguish the flames when any house is on fire. They paint the Jews in several places in all manner of ridiculous forms, to render them despicable and odious, notwithstanding some learned men have been produced among them.

Jews numerous and dispersed at Frankfort.

They had a famous casuist at Spire, in the middle of the last century, named, from his birth-place, Nathan de Spira. He published the Good of the Land, in which he celebrated the Holy Land. He composed a volume of profundities, (Megillath Hamucoth,) which is a commentary upon some verses of Deuteronomy, wherein he pretends to found the depths of mysteries, and to resolve the difficulties he finds in them.

But one of the most famous doctors that Germany produced in the last century, was Isaac Loria, author of the Metaphysical Introduction to the Jewish Cabala. He was a native of Jerusalem; and his appellation of German was only given him on account of his long abode in that country; for he retired again into Palestine, towards the latter end of his life, and was buried at Sapheta, in Upper Galilee.

Other eminent rabbies.

OF all the states of Europe, according to one of their writers, there is not one where the Jews live more quietly than in Holland. They enrich themselves by trade, and, through the lenity of the government, possess their acquisitions without fear. There are two sorts of Jews in Holland; some are Germans, and others come from Portugal and Spain. They are divided about some ceremonies, and hate one another, as if the essentials of religion were concerned. But the real cause of this extreme hatred between those two sorts of Jews, if we may credit the Germans, is the dissimulation and remissness of those of Portugal and Spain, who live in those countries, and conform in all things with the popish religion, for the sake of enriching themselves, and then retire to Holland, to enjoy, with more safety, the fruits of their hypocrisy.

State of the Jews in Holland.

The Spanish and Portuguese Jews, who make another part of this nation, retired into Holland to avoid the cruelties of the inquisition. Strada accuses one of their leaders with having intrigued in the war of the Low Countries, and kindled the fire of enmity by promising a potent supply. His name was Michez. He was a Spaniard born; but the fear of punishment had obliged him to seek sanctuary at Antwerp, where he grew into the knowledge and affection not only of the magistrates of this city, but of Mary, queen of Hungary, who reigned at that time. Going from Antwerp to Venice, and from thence to Constantinople, he wrote to the malecontents he knew, and to the Protestants of Antwerp, intimating, "that it was their best way to adhere constantly to the league they had made against the Catholics, because the grand seignior was meditating designs against the Christians; and in a short time would so embarrass king Philip, as not to give him leisure to think of the affairs of the Netherlands." His letters were read in the senate of Antwerp, and gave great encouragement to the allies; but Michez did not make good his promise. He followed his master's views, who turned his arms against the kingdom of Cyprus. It only appears that the Jews were more secure in the Netherlands than in Spain, since Michez sought a retreat there; but it was but forty years after that the refugees of Spain and Portugal began to settle in Holland. Their first assembly at Amsterdam occasioned some jealousy in the city, where all things were suspected during the war, which continued with great vigour. They were taken for Roman Catholics, who shut themselves up, and concealed their images. They say they were pursued into the place of their religious worship; but as they found nothing but Hebrew books, and the law of Moses, they laid no other condition on them, than to pray for the prosperity of the city, which they promised to do; and at the same time they erected their first synagogue, which they called the House of Ben Jacob, because that was the name of a rich Jew by whom it was founded.

A division

built.

They raised another synagogue, which they called Neve Schalom, that is, the House of Peace. These synagogues conjointly laboured upon a collection of prayers, but they could not agree about it. The last was headed by a famous rabbi, named Judah Vega, that came from Africa, which he left, and retired to Constantinople, where he published the history of his nation down to the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus. Uziel, who succeeded him, censured the faults of his nation so severely, as to incur its hatred. A third synagogue was formed, in which the schismatics assembled under the conduct of David Pardo. It was called the House of Israel.

As is the inevitable effect of all ecclesiastical separations, as well as civil wars, these dissensions were accompanied with feuds. The synagogue of Ben Jacob espoused the separatists. But the schism ceased, after it had continued somewhat about twenty years, and the three synagogues united in one, to which they gave, as to many others, the title of Talmud Thora, that is, the Study or Science of the Law.

Union of the three
synagogues.

They have been careful to found schools as well as synagogues, one whereof is called the Crown of the Law, and has been governed by learned men. But that which most displays the prosperity of this nation, is the great and stately edifice they consecrated in the year 1675, which has been so deservedly admired by all judges of architecture, and so much celebrated by their own preachers, that there has been a collection printed of the sermons delivered on that occasion.

These preachers are not perhaps the only men that have done honour to the synagogue. It has had also many poets in the last century, and has produced celebrated doctors.

his works.

R. Menasseh was one of the most learned and able theologists that has appeared among the Jews for many ages. He was of Spanish origin, of the family of the Abravancels. At eighteen years of age he was chosen at Amsterdam to explain the Talmud, in which employ he acquired a reputation which drew upon him the jealousy and enmity of the rabbies; but he despised their calumnies, and continued his application to study. He was not eight and twenty when he published the 1st part of his Conciliator on the Pentateuch, wherein he endeavoured to reconcile the seeming contradictions of Scripture, by the explications of ancient and modern doctors, and his own conjectures. This work, which he finished afterwards, gained him universal reputation; and, indeed, no rabbi has written upon this subject with such solid erudition. He composed some time after, his problems upon the creation. He also wrote a treatise on the resurrection, in which he undertook to prove the immortality of the soul, and its operations, not only whilst united to the body, but after its separation. As he was head of the synagogue at Amsterdam, he was obliged to study the rites and laws, so that he wrote two tracts upon them; one of which was an abridgment of the Mishnah, with this title, "The Treasure of Judgments." The other particularly related to questions concerning marriage, the condition of children, and the division of estates. He also wrote a defence of the Babylonian Talmud; and composed a treatise concerning the Science of the Talmudists, and of Rabbinical Philosophy. He translated Phocylides into Spanish verse; made queen Christina's panegyric, and a prayer for the prince of Orange. He also formed a design of writing the history of his nation, from Josephus to his own time. It seems that he began this work, but could not finish it. Another author formed the same design afterwards.

Bartolucci accused him of having taken the advantage of the civil wars in England, to prevail upon Oliver Cromwell to permit the Jews to settle there. On the other hand, a Jewish historian affirms, that Cromwell and his parliament invited him over to treat about that affair. But, without entering farther into the matter of fact, it appears natural for him to endeavour to procure such an advantageous settlement to his nation as that of England. However, whether invited or not, it is plain he came over to England with that design, and was well received by Cromwell and the parliament, as was his Apology for the Jews, in which he exploded all the calumnies raised against his nation, and pleaded their cause so well, that, if we may believe some authors of those times, he obtained a much better settlement, and greater privileges, for them, than ever they had enjoyed before in England.

Bartolucci charges him with other frivolous matters, which he represents as crimes; such as his taking part with the remonstrants, in order to obtain their friendship and protection, and printing his works without the approbation of the Christian divines; but he has been sufficiently cleared from these imputations. He died at Amsterdam, in the year 1652, and left a son, who inherited his press, and employed it in printing some of his father's works.

Menasseh had a panegyrist and friend in a famous physician, called Zacuth, who was born at Lisbon in the year 1575. His parents, who dissembled their Judaism, and made outward profession of popery, lent him to study at Salamanca and Coimbra. From thence he returned and settled in his native place, where he was much esteemed, because he was very charitable to his poor patients, and performed considerable cures at court. He wrote many books, and amongst others an History of the Principal Physicians, which he dedicated to a canon of the cathedral of Lisbon, and residentiary in that metropolis. After having dissembled thirty years, he retired to Amsterdam, where he was circumcised, and died a Jew, leaving several works unfinished, which he designed to print. Those he published were of the physical kind.

his works.

Athias, a native of Spain, taught at first at Hamburg; but he came from thence to Amsterdam. He printed a bible, which was greatly esteemed. Mr. Vander Hoogt has given a new edition of this bible, much more exact. The preface of this learned man explains his design and manner of executing it.

Athias's Treasure of Precepts and Judgments was printed first at Venice, with the approbation of all the sages of that country. The author thought himself obliged to treat on this subject, because the most useful of all books are those that teach the fear of God. The preceding doctors had composed many of them, but the Spanish dispersion had destroyed great part of these works. Besides, these ancient writers composed them in Arabic, which was then better understood. He proves that this treatise was necessary, because the law without a commentary, is a torch without light; and to render it more useful, he joined tradition to the law, and practical rules to speculative truths. He explains also the knowledge of those rites which are not at present in use;

use; that the Jews, who know them, being convinced of their excellency, may ardently desire their restoration. The commentary upon each precept is short, and well adapted to explain the Jewish laws.

Isaac Aboab, who came from Brasil, was not only a reputable preacher, but a great casuist. He translated a work, called Ira's Gate of Heaven, from Spanish into Hebrew, from whose version it has since been rendered into Latin. He published a paraphrase upon the Pentateuch, and sung Moses's Triumph in heroic verse.

Musaphia was another learned man, who commented on the Jerusalem Talmud. He studied a subject that was still more obscure and intricate, as he undertook to explain the flux and reflux of the sea. He was so perfect a master of the Hebrew tongue, that he composed a dictionary, in which he took a more easy method than had been hitherto adopted.

We ought not to forget Spinoza, who made himself famous by the singularity of his tenets. He was born at Amsterdam in 1632. His parents were Portuguese Jews, in good circumstances; but he received nothing but a bed from his father's possessions, and always lived in poverty. He did not aspire to follow the law, and imitate the rabbies, but learnt the trade of polishing glasses, and making spectacles. He compared himself to a serpent that bites his tail, because he had nothing left at the year's end, though he lived upon milk and gruel. He had learnt Latin of Vanden Ende, who taught then at Amsterdam; and who, retiring to Rikpus, embarked in the Chevalier de Rohan's conspiracy, and was executed. It is pretended it was this pedant that sowed the first seeds of atheism in Spinoza's mind. But it was Descartes's philosophy which gave him a dislike to the principles of the rabbies. He did not find in their writings those evident truths built upon demonstrations, which Descartes recommends to his disciples. When he was perceived to neglect the sabbath and synagogue, they attempted, in vain, to retain him by a pension of a thousand livres. By this refusal he incurred so violent an hatred, that it was resolved to stab him. As he came from the old Portuguese synagogue of Amsterdam, he saw a man with a dagger in his hand, and endeavoured to shun him; and, indeed, the blow only reached his coat, which he kept in memory of this event. Not thinking himself safe in his native country, where the Jews were numerous and potent, he sought a retreat near Leyden, and afterwards at the Hague. He had the great excommunication thundered against him; but he protested against this sentence given in his absence, and signified his protestation by a writing in Spanish, addressed to the rabbies in the synagogue. He published first a geometrical demonstration of Descartes's Principles; afterwards his Meditations; and at last produced the Tractatus Theologico Politicus, in which he formed a new system, that makes him much esteemed by those who are called Freethinkers in Holland, Germany, and France, from whom he received several invitations, and large encouragements; but he refused them all, and died at the Hague in 1677, aged forty-four years. He left behind him a sect that has espoused his principles. We cannot tell whether it be numerous, since it is constituted of persons dispersed in different places, who form no body or society.

As Spinoza had many followers and disciples, so also had he many opposers of his own nation, particularly the learned Balthazar Orobio, a Spaniard by birth, and a physician by profession. His parents, who professed the Roman religion, taught him betimes to dissemble like themselves. He studied philosophy, and became metaphysical reader in the university of Salamanca, being a lover of this science, which was then much cultivated. He afterwards became a physician at Seville, where he was seized by the inquisition, because he did not sufficiently conceal his religion to remove all suspicion. At length, tired with dissembling, he came to Amsterdam, was circumcised, and made open profession of Judaism. He practised physic there with great reputation; and assures us, that his pressing occupations did not permit him to apply himself to study as he could wish. When Spinoza's book appeared, he at first despised it on account of its author; but when he received Bredenburg's answer to it, in which that author agreed with Spinoza in two dangerous positions, he seemed to hesitate about them. Orobio undertook to confute them both, and in the execution of this task proved himself an able metaphysician.

There have been eminent rabbies in other cities. David Cohen de Lara, Hoziel's disciple, is compared to Hercules, the conqueror of monsters. He composed the City of David, in which he proves the analogy of the Hebrew with the Greek, and many other languages. He wrote also the Crown of the Priesthood, which a dictionary much larger than Nathan's, since he has added two thousand words to it. He translated the Beginning of Wisdom out of Hebrew into Spanish, a title borrowed from these words of Solomon, "The Fear of the Lord is the beginning of Wisdom." Bartolucci has not mentioned this last work; but yet it is evidently his, since a Spanish poet, who has written his encomium, and must have known him, attributes it to him.

The last we shall mention is Juda Leon, so well known for his description of Solomon's temple, which fine piece he composed at Middleburgh. The Spaniards claim his birth, because he was originally of that country; but he left it in pursuit of a liberty which he wanted in his native soil. That he might have a clearer idea of the temple of Jerusalem, he built one of wood, upon the plans he had drawn from several authors of his nation. He afterwards formed the description of his edifice, which he published first in French, and printed at Amsterdam. He likewise enlarged this work, and translated it into Hebrew. The learned admired so exact a picture of this ancient edifice; and the duke of Brunswick ordered it to be translated into Latin, that he might judge of it himself. Juda added to this first work, a Description of the Tabernacle, a Treatise on Cherubims, and an Explication of the Psalms. He undertook also to expound all the metaphorical passages of the Talmud. He says himself, that this work cost him a great deal of labour and pains. He wrote a narrative of some conferences he had maintained against some Christian doctors. But these two last tracts were never printed; nor that of the Manner of offering the Morning and Evening Sacrifice.

The Jews are no less numerous and flourishing at the Hague, where they have also a noble synagogue, and where those who are become wealthy seek a peaceable and delightful retirement. Here they enjoy the greatest prosperity, live in the greatest luxury, and in the most sumptuous edifices. Yet such is their happiness under that government, that they enjoy their wealth and grandeur without raising the jealousy, zeal, and envy of the populace; whilst the rest carry on a considerable traffic both at home and abroad, without being liable to those heavy impositions, vexations, prosecutions, prescriptions, and other disasters, under which we have seen them groan in other parts of Europe.

In England they are allowed full liberty of their religion, a full freedom of trade, and the quiet enjoyment of their property. They are like those of Holland, commonly distinguished into German and Portuguese, or more properly into northern and southern, and have each their respective synagogues, chiefs, schools, &c. but no academy; so that they are obliged to send their youth to be educated in Germany, or at Amsterdam. The former are by far the more indigent, as well as zealous for their religion, and careful to instruct their meanest children in it; whereas the latter, being rich, and some of them opulent, are more remiss in all these respects, insomuch that many of them cannot so much as understand the liturgy of their synagogues, but have it translated into Portuguese. The character of the lower

state of the Jews in all
world.

WE have now brought the history of the eastern and western Jews down to the close of the 17th century. It remains only that we give our readers an account of their present state in all parts of the world. Several eminent writers, both of their nation, and among the Christians, have endeavoured to ascertain their number, among whom we shall only select some few, who seem to have been the most successful in their enquiries.

R. Luzati's

R. Simon Luzati, who taught at Venice, owns it to be very difficult to give an exact account of the Jews at present, dispersed into so many places. "We cannot (says he) give any certain intelligence of the ten tribes Salmanazar carried away; nor is it known where they are, though the whole world be sufficiently known. To begin with the east. We know there are abundance of Jews in the kingdom of Persia, though they have but little liberty. The Turkish empire is their chief retreat; not only because they have been settled there a long time, but because many of those banished out of Spain retired thither. There are more of them at Constantinople and Salonichi, than in any other place. They reckon above fourscore thousand in these two cities; and above a million in the empire of the grand seignior. A great number of pilgrims come from all corners of the world to Jerusalem; and considerable sums are sent there for the benefit of the poor, and to keep up the academies. There are many of them in the dominions of the emperor of Germany; but they are more numerous in Poland, Lithuania, and Russia. Here we have academies and disciples in great numbers, who study our civil and canon laws, because we are allowed the privilege of judging in all civil and criminal cases which happen in the nation. There are not so many Jews in the Protestant states which separate from the Roman church; yet they treat them with great charity and indulgence in the Low Countries, particularly at Rotterdam, Amsterdam, and Hamburgh, because these merchandizing cities are open to foreigners. All the Italian princes receive the Jews, countenance, protect them, and inviolably maintain their privileges without alteration; and I believe there are not less than twenty-five thousand in this country. Fez and Morocco, and the other neighbouring cities, which are not subject to the Turks, contain greater numbers, because they are not remote from Spain or Portugal, from whence they may retire thither. There are other places upon the coast of Africa which are also peopled with Jews; but as we know but little of them, it is hard to fix their number." Thus this Italian rabbi, who not only since taught at Venice, described the state of his nation; to which let us add the account which Menasses has left us.

Menasses observes, that this oracle cannot be applied to the return from the Babylonish captivity, because God did not then recall all the dispersed tribes, nor all the Israelites that were scattered among the nations. The deliverance promised is called the second, because that general one from Egypt was before it; whereas the return from Babylon only respected two tribes; and when the Israelites left Assyria, to pass into the Holy Land, they did not cross the Nile, nor any river of Egypt or Ethiopia, as it was promised they shall at the general redemption; or the waters of the Nile and Euphrates shall be divided to leave a free passage to the tribes, like the waters of the Red Sea, when Israel came out of Egypt.

Hence he concludes, that Isaiah intimates the general return of the nation, and the different places it shall come from. The prophet speaks, 1. "Of Assyria and Egypt, because in these two provinces the twelve tribes shall be re-united. 2. He mentions Pathros, by which we must not understand either Pelusium or Petra, but the Parthians lying near the Caspian Sea, where many doctors place the river Sabbathan, beyond which dwell a great number of Jews. 3. Cush is Ethiopia. And in reality, there are many tribes in Abyssinia. 4. Elam is a province of Persia, on the other side of the Euphrates, where we find hideous deserts, not inhabited, in which one part of the nation is concealed. 5. Shinar is another province near Babylon; for Moses has situated Babel in the land of Shinar; and Daniel relates, that Nebuchadnezzar carried the vessels of the temple into the land of Shinar. 6. The scripture speaks often of Hamath; and the Chaldee paraphrast, who is followed by many interpreters, affirms, that this is Antioch. They reckon twelve cities of this name, which have been built in divers places by different princes; but this is the city of Antioch in Asia, in Tartary. 7. The Septuagint interpreters have translated the word Hamath by the east, and they had reason for it, because Hamath is, perhaps, the same thing with Hamah, the sun, or the east. So that the prophet speaks there of the Jews, who are, at present, dispersed in the east of the Holy Land, that is, in the Great Asia, the East-Indies, and China. 8. Isaiah declares, that the Israelites should come from the isles of the sea, for so many interpreters have translated it. But it ought to be translated the isles of the west; because, in all the places where the scripture speaks of the four parts of the world, it means the west, by the word yam; and the prophet, under this expression, includes all that are towards the sun-setting, westward of the Holy Land; that is, the Jews who, at present, people a certain part of America.

"Lastly, the prophet affirms, that God shall bring back the out-casts of Israel; and he uses a word which signifies separated, (excommunicated,) because, in reality, the ten tribes, separated from the rest, not only inhabit places very remote from the Holy Land, but are concealed in the extremities of the earth, and in the provinces peopled by the Gentiles; but for the Jews, they are dispersed, and God shall gather them together from the four corners of the earth. Because, indeed, the tribe of Judah is dispersed in different places, and it has synagogues in America, it shall return from all the corners of the earth; but there shall be no more division or jealousy betwixt these two parts of the nation, betwixt Ephraim and Judah, as says the prophet Ezekiel. There shall be but one king, and they shall be no more two nations; neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms."

We pretend not to reconcile these two rabbies, nor to follow them step by step; yet the general account they give us of the present condition of the Jews deserves to be considered. They do not agree about the fate of the ten tribes; for one says, they have been destroyed long ago: and the other maintains, that they are concealed in America, and in several places where Divine Providence has conveyed, and miraculously preserves them, till they appear again at the general deliverance, when they shall come from all the places they inhabit, and rendezvous in Assyria and Egypt, from whence they shall all fly to Jerusalem like birds to their nest.

Menasses

Menaffes supports his opinion upon the people of America's being unknown, and not appearing to have any communication with the rest of the inhabitants. The Spaniards affirm, that, when they came into Peru, they found there a stately edifice, dedicated to the Creator of the Universe; so that as the Indians were idolaters, and as yet had no knowledge of iron tools used in building houses, this structure must be considered as a synagogue erected by the Jews. The Indians also approved this conjecture, since their tradition signified, that this palace had been built by a bearded nation, more ancient than the Incas.

A Jewish inscription at one of the Azores.

R. Menaffes likewise quotes an inscription found in the island of St. Michael, one of the Azores, mentioned by Genebrard, which, though somewhat difficult to be decyphered, unless it be by a transposition of letters, yet, by the character and words, appears plainly enough to have been made by some Jews who arrived in this island.

It appears to us that the ten tribes subsist still in the east, and in most of the places where Salmanassar carried them. We have already observed, that Salmanassar had placed them upon the banks of the Chaboras, which falls into the Euphrates, which is the same river the Greeks call Abboras. Procopius says, it was a great river. Indeed, Julian's army passed over it upon a bridge of boats. Strabo says, it run near Anthemusia, which some have thought a city, and others a province depending on the Persians; because Ammianus Marcellinus places a citadel, called Barne, in it. This river emptied itself into the Euphrates; and at its mouth stood Carchemis, since called Cercusium. On the west was Ptolemy's Chalcitis, and the city Carra. On the east was the province of Ganzan, betwixt the two rivers Chaboras and Saocoras. This was the first situation of the tribes. But they spread into the neighbouring provinces, and upon the banks of the Euphrates. The ten tribes were still in being in this country when Jerusalem was destroyed, since they came in multitudes to bring their oblations to the temple. They subsisted there from that time to the eleventh century of the Christian church, since they had their chiefs of the captivity, and most flourishing academies. Though they were considerably weakened by persecutions, yet travellers of that nation discovered many of their brethren and synagogues in the twelfth and fourteenth centuries. No new colony has been sent into the east, nor have those that were there been driven out. At this day a great number of Jews are to be found in Persia. We have also deduced our history from age to age, without observing any other change than what was caused by the different revolutions of that empire, the various tempers of the governors, or the inevitable decay of a nation which only subsists by toleration. We have therefore reason to conclude, that the ten tribes are still in the east, and that they are neither destroyed, or gone from thence into some remote quarter of the world. They are so blended one tribe with another, that they cannot now possibly be distinguished; and it could hardly, without a miracle, have happened otherwise during so long a series of ages, and such vicissitudes as they have undergone.

Ten tribes, here.

It is therefore reasonable to conclude, that the ten tribes are at present dispersed in Persia, and all the east; and that those in America constitute no body; so far are they from having kings, and possessing a great extent of land unknown to the most exploring travellers.

Neither ten tribes are in China.

Several authors, both Jews and Christians, have likewise affirmed, that the ten tribes were still preserved in China. One of the former tells us that there was a synagogue at Pekin, which had cost them 10,000 crowns to repair. He asserted, that they had been settled in this province above five hundred years, and that they religiously preserved one of the five books of Moses, which he called Sepher Thora. He could not read Hebrew, having neglected the study of it in his youth; so that he was excluded from the offices and government of the synagogue, which his brother exercised, because he understood the language; but he repeated the historical parts of the Old Testament, particularly those of Abraham, Judith, and Esther. He added, that there were, in the capital of the province of Chequiam, many synagogues, and Israelitish families; for they give themselves that name, because, being the posterity of the ten tribes, they knew not that of the Jews.

Alvarez, who had lived in China a considerable time, affirms, that they had been settled there above 600 years, and had obtained several privileges on account of their services and fidelity to king Hun; that they were very numerous in some provinces, and had synagogues in most of their great cities, but more especially in that of Honan, and in Kai-tong-fu, where they have a repository for the sacred volume, adorned with rich curtains, and in which they preserve an ancient bible in Hebrew characters. These Jews, however, we are told, know nothing of Hebrew, and only mention the names of Abraham, Isaac, and David; are very ignorant, and remiss in their law, even to the neglecting of circumcision, because the Chinese upbraid them with the cruelty of performing the ceremony on innocent babes.

Alvarez's account of them.

We are still more at a loss what to think of a letter which the Jews of Cochin are said to have sent some time ago to the synagogue of Amsterdam, importing, "That they withdrew into the Indies at the time that the Romans conquered the Holy Land. They affirm, they have had seventy-two kings there, succeeding one another for a thousand years; and that then a division arising thro' the jealousy of two brothers, who disputed the crown, the neighbouring princes subdued them. From that time they continued subject to the Indian kings. However, they had given so many testimonies of their loyalty to these princes, that Samuel Caltoel, who died in 1640, was governor of Cochin, and left his government to a man of the same name and religion with himself." But this succession of seventy-two kings, founded upon the retreat of the Jews to Cochin in Titus's time, seems only an invention to support the dignity of the nation. They refer us to remote times and unknown histories, because there is nothing to be found in this present worth our admiration.

All that we can infer from these various accounts is, that there are now some Jews dispersed in the East-Indies. There are some of them at Cochin, Gora, Malabar, in China, and even in the isles of America; but they are not the ten tribes that passed into these countries. They are merchants, drawn thither by commerce from all the families of the dispersion, which can only be distinguished by an uncertain, not to say entirely false, tradition. Besides, there is no place where the nation have kings, and a supreme government. They live in the east, and in America, as in Europe, under the dominion of Christian or Infidel princes. In fine, if we would seek out the remains of the ten tribes, we must do it only on the banks of the Euphrates, in Persia, and the neighbouring provinces, as we have sufficiently proved.

Present state of the Jews in the east.

In Turkey, Fez, Barbary, and Egypt, indeed, they are somewhat more tolerated, and sometimes admitted into public functions, especially in Egypt. The Ottoman princes even send them upon some embassies, in which they value themselves on making a figure for the credit of their nation; and their flourishing condition under that government makes them so numerous, that they are reckoned to amount to a million; so that, upon the whole, we may allow them to be about one million, three hundred thousand, dispersed over the east.

In the Ottoman empire.

The Jewish writers divide the west between two sovereigns, or rather between two prevailing religions, the Protestants and the Roman Catholics. 1. They highly praise the popes; for popish Rome (say they) has always protected them, since its general, Titus, took Jerusalem. He was not general of papist but of heathen Rome. But the popes sometimes have persecuted instead of protecting them. Nevertheless, they have great reason to glory in the papal protection; for the good they have received from it by far outweighs the evils. If the pope honours the Jews with his protection, the kings under his obedience treat them in an harsh and barbarous manner. The Spanish and Portuguese inquisitions reduce them to the dilemma of being either hypocrites, or submitting to the flames.

The number of dissemblers is very considerable; and it ought not to be inferred that there are no Jews in Spain or Portugal, because they are not known; they are so much the more dangerous, for not only being very numerous, but confounded with ecclesiastics, and entering into ecclesiastical dignities. They are tolerated no where but at Metz, where the number of dissemblers is not so great: but there are some of them in trading towns, and they have a sanctuary in the cities of the empire. Poland and Lithuania are a far more safe retreat for them, and here they are most flourishing.

Great freedom in Poland and Lithuania.

Complaint against the Protestants obviated.

Their writers complain often of the Protestants, as not having sufficient humanity. However, they find not among them the barbarous court of inquisition. They live peaceably in many cities where the reformation is established; and Holland, of all places in the world, is that where they make the greatest figure.

Jews highly value themselves.

It must be confessed that they are excessive proud of their origin, and think it injurious to be suspected either of baseness or treachery. On these accounts they highly resent every restraint that is laid on them, and are uneasy and impatient under their present state of servitude and subjection to other nations, whom they look upon as their inferiors, in point of antiquity, religion, and national pre-eminence.

CHAP. XXVI.

Recall of the Jews foretold by Hosea. Also by St. Paul. Endeavours taken to effect their conversion. Their dissimulation. Ordinances of the council of Nice rejected. Instances of false conversion. Forms of abjurations prosecuted by the Greek church. Extract of some of the forms. Estates of proselytes sequestered. General remarks by way of conclusion.

WE have now finished the history of the Jews, and seen this nation, dispersed into all parts of the world, preserve itself in being, though destitute of all the ordinary bonds and ties of society. We find among them neither prince or high-priest, who might re-unite his subjects and people by an authority duly respected. Indeed, the prophet Hosea has foretold, that "the children of Israel shall abide many days without a king, and without a prince, and without a sacrifice, and without an image, and without an ephod, and without teraphim: afterward shall the children of Israel return, and seek the Lord their God, and David their king." By this the prophet designs to represent the remarkable state of the nation. 1. It shall have no king or prince. Sovereign authority is the foundation of states; it is impossible to subsist without a centre of union, and a government that checks the insolence of the people, and punishes their crimes. The Jews preferred monarchical government before the liberty they enjoyed under their judges. At present they have neither king or governor. Ask them where are the kings of the nation, or the judges, those deliverers and leaders that God sent them instead of kings, they cannot produce one. 2. The sacrifices made up the most essential part of their religion; and the ephod, composed of precious stones, in which was the Urim and Thummin, ennobled the high-priest that wore it. The sacrifices and the priest have been abolished for above seventeen hundred years. 3. It was natural for this people, who had lost all that was exterior in its religion, to borrow the images and teraphim from other nations. The Jews' inclination for statues, and sensible objects of religion, was so violent, that it could not be repressed but by continual and singular chastisements. It is, indeed, the general inclination of mankind; for, upon examination, you will find that almost all religions had their sacrifices or idols, and commonly both. However, the Jews have neither sacrifices or teraphim, tho' they are passionately fond both of the one and the other. They can no longer sacrifice at Jerusalem; and they never fall into idolatry, though they are encompassed with idolatrous nations. 4. They are to remain in this condition many days; that is to say, a long time. Indeed, seventeen centuries have already passed since they have been without king or governor, without image or sacrifice. They are not without God, but without the worship they are obliged to pay him; for they have neither sacrifices or ephod. 5. The last circumstance is very remarkable; for Hosea declares, they shall seek David their king. David has been long since dead; and his posterity is so extinct or confounded, that even the Jews cannot distinguish it. David, therefore, who shall be their king, can be no other than the deliverer promised by the prophets, and the Messiah, to whom they shall return. But since the time of his coming is past, and the prophet effectively speaks of a king who existed before they sought for him, we have reason to believe that the Jews, by returning to God, shall acknowledge this David, this anointed of the Lord, this Messiah whom he hath sent.

St. Paul hath also foretold that all Israel shall be saved, and that the deliverer shall come out of Zion. Perhaps it should be translated to Zion; for this better agrees with the apostle's idea, who affirms, that the Goel, the Deliverer, by way of excellence, shall address himself to the Jewish nation: that is what Zachary says, "Rejoice, O daughter of Zion, behold thy king cometh unto thee." Moreover, it was upon this hope of God's recalling his people, that the fathers, and many divines, have maintained, that they were to be more kindly treated than the rest of the erroneous.

Also by St. Paul.

Many attempts have been made to accomplish this great work, and those who have laboured in it have sometimes brought over considerable numbers; but these conversions have ever been suspected. In the beginning of the sixth century the council of Agde in vain endeavoured to secure the fidelity of the Jews that turned Christians. "They return very often to their vomit," said the council. "They are faithless in their promises, and therefore they must be obliged to a six months instruction among the Catechumens; and after that experiment be baptized, upon assurance of their sincerity." Which law was not to be violated, except for those that were in danger of death; for then they hastened their baptism.

General dissent of the Jews.

A second council of Nice observed, that the new converts wavered in their private opinion concerning Christianity, when they had embraced it; and therefore they were ordered to maintain their religion, and to profess it publicly: and at the same time it was forbidden to baptize their children, or to appropriate their slaves, unless a man was fully assured of the sincerity of their faith.

But these ordinances were neither received or constantly observed: for Florus, who lived a little after the Nicene council, has preserved the letter of a bishop to the emperor, in which he implores the secular arm against the Jews and their children. The emperor, to whom the letter is addressed, was Charles the Bald. The prelate represents to the prince, that he ordered preaching every Saturday in the synagogue, and that many people having embraced Christianity, he had employed them to bring over the children, who were much easier won than those who were grown obstinate in error; but that the fathers, disgusted with this artifice, had sent most of their children into the cities of Mascon, Vienna, and Arles, where they were more powerful and numerous, which had displeased him. He added, that he had summoned all the Jews before him, and upon asking whether any would embrace Christianity? immediately six children threw themselves at his feet, and desired baptism; and that this example had been followed by forty-seven others. He concluded from thence, that, if the emperor gave his orders to the bishop of Arles, and forced him to do the same thing, many of them might be gained: and the motive was the more forcible, because, if it be an act of charity to relieve a man from the jaws of wild beasts that would devour him, it is much greater to deliver a soul out of the hands of those who would destroy it.

Ordinances of the council of Nice rejected in France.

It appears that this bishop made no scruple to baptize Jewish children, by forcing them from their fathers; and that the authority of the second Nicene council was not respected in France, which condemned these baptisms, that contradicted the laws of nature. St. Remi affirms, indeed, that he sent back many children, without doing them any violence; but yet he baptized all he could get, tho' void of knowledge. The complaint he made of those fathers, who took precautions against his solicitations, and the petition he presented to the emperor, to force the bishop of Arles to follow his example, are arguments sufficient to prove that this bishop neither regarded the law of nature, or that of the council of Nice.

It was still more openly violated, by maintaining, that all Jews were the slaves of Christians; for hereby they appropriated their children, and had power to appropriate their persons, and to subject them to the severest slavery; whereas the council would not so much as have their slaves appropriated, unless they were assured of the sincerity of their conversion.

It cannot be matter of wonder that the Christians of these times have been so often deluded by conversions, since they took so little pains to render them valid. Amongst the many instances, we shall only cite the following.

Instances of false conversions.

Conrad Otton, after his baptism, wrote violently against the synagogue. He charged it "with having very few persons that read Hebrew, and understood the Talmud, and other books necessary to the becoming learned; that they lived there like beasts, without thinking of futurity; that, in their prayers, they knew not, for the most part, what they said, and gave no attention; that great part of them knew not what they professed to believe, or understood so much as the means of salvation." Nevertheless, this devotee, so scandalized by the ignorance of his brethren, quitted this profession in the university of Altorf, and returned to Judaism.

Some years ago a rabbinical professor at Vienna, who was thought zealous for Christianity, for the sake of which he translated the epistle of the Hebrews into Hebrew, and rendered Abravanel's commentaries upon the prophets into Latin, disappeared, to return to the synagogue he had left.

In Spain and Portugal we find such as seem to be converts commonly ridiculing the converters. A Portuguese, known by the name of Rodriguez Castell Albi, or White Castle, but more by the books he published, which gave him the reputation of one of the most ingenious men of his age, left his country to seek a sanctuary at Rome. But fearing his apostacy would be severely chastised, he went to many other cities of Italy under the same apprehensions. Having dissembled in divers places, he retreated to Thessalonica, where seeing himself secure, he professed the religion he had always believed, and disguised under the mask of Christianity.

The Grecian church thought it could not be too precautions in admitting into its pale those of a suspected faith; for we find some marks of its severity in their forms of abjuration, which the Jewish proselytes were obliged to make. There are two. One is inserted in the Greek ritual; and the other found by Mr. Cotelier, in a manuscript of the king of France's library. This last is much newer and larger than the other, because they add to such sort of pieces at pleasure. We prefer this last formulary to the first, because it is more ample, and we would wish to avoid controversy.

First, the priest obliges the converted Jew to own that he does it voluntarily, and that neither fear or hope has any influence on his conversion; that he has been led to it neither by poverty, or the desire of riches, or honours, or violence, or any human motives. He was obliged also to make a protestation of his innocence, lest the change of his religion should be undertaken to avoid the punishments he had deserved. This first article is not found in the ritual of the Greeks. 2. He was made to abjure very precisely all the Jewish worship, the unleavened bread, circumcision, the passover, fairs, sabbaths, &c. 3. He was obliged to anathematize all the heresies and sects that have been among the Jews. The sectaries are here considered as the defenders of traditions, whereof rabbi Akiba made the first collection; Annas composed the second; and Judas, one of the Almonians, who violated the sabbath, is looked upon as the author of the third. Those also were anathematized that kept the feast of Mordecai and Haman, and the initiators of another feast, called Monopodana, because, at its celebration, they danced upon one foot. They anathematized Elias Benjamin Zebedee, Abram and Simbatus, who are looked upon as infidels. The proselyte was obliged to make a confession of faith; to which they have subjoined several additions, according to the exigencies of the times. Lastly, he was enjoined to declare, that, if he made not this profession with his whole heart, without any design to return to Judaism, if he had ever any commerce with the Jews, either by entering into their synagogues, or eating with them, he imprecated upon himself the severest vengeance.

Extract of one of the forms.

Attempts have been made to win them over by promises of a temporal prosperity, which was a great temptation; but through an unaccountable capriciousness, they took away the estates of the proselytes in France; and Charles VI. was obliged to prevent the confiscation of the goods of those that were baptized. This prince's ordinance is still extant, by which we see, 1. That they seized the estate of a Jew who embraced Christianity, and, instead of recompensing his faith, reduced him to a state of necessity. 2. The king had a share in this oppression with the princes of the realm. 3. Tho' he issued a declaration to prevent this abuse, yet Joseph de Vala, who had been baptized by the name of Lewis de Harcourt, desiring this prince to restore his estate which they had confiscated, he only gave him part of it, and assigned the rest to some of his courtiers.

Estates of proselytes sequestered.

Gregory the Great, reversing the practices above-mentioned, made a point of reclaiming the erroneous, by soothing them as it were into a love of Christianity. He discharged the Jews from oppressive exactions and burthenome taxes, candidly judging that thereby either the fathers or the children might be brought over, and that, if the former were not truly converted, the latter might be baptized, and trained up in the Christian faith. But this lenient method proved as ineffectual as the former rigorous efforts; for, in matters of conscience, where the principle is actuated by motives merely interested, there can be no sincerity. The emperor Arcadius therefore, perceiving that the Jews came over to the church only to screen themselves from prosecution for crimes or debts, prohibited any from being admitted that were charged with accusations, or had not satisfied the demands of their creditors.

Lenity of Gregory the Great.

Sometimes they have attempted to prevail with them by introducing superstitions, rites, and the adoration of creatures of human formation; tho' nothing could be more repugnant to the end proposed. Upon the whole, all the human means that have been used to effect the conversion of this people, have been rendered abortive by a kind of impenetrable obduracy, and unconquerable prejudice, which seems, as it were, congenial with their very nature; nature; ■ subject that may afford scope for some instructive remarks by way of conclusion.

General
remarks.

We find, then, from the corresponding testimonies of history, both sacred and prophane, that, from the earliest ages to the present day, unbelief has been the grand source of all the calamities that have befallen the Jews. Indeed, a disregard of divine revelation has proved, and ever will prove, most destructive to the human race in general. Disobedience to the Divine command given to our first parents, was the fatal source of all the woes entailed upon their wretched posterity, who partook of their degeneracy, and, at the earliest period, evinced a natural aversion to good, and a propensity to evil. Notwithstanding the signal interposition of Divine Providence, and the evident marks of the Divine displeasure, the ancient Hebrews were almost perpetually lapsing into idolatry, and falling into the commission of the most atrocious enormities. Nay, the crying abominations of ■ degenerate world gave occasion for the Divine vengeance to involve them in an universal deluge.

When it pleased the Almighty to restrain the impetuous torrent, and permit the remaining few, whom his mercy had spared, to revisit the earth, Noah, indeed, gave most demonstrative proof of his pious gratitude to an all-gracious deliverer; but his descendants soon discovered an innate obduracy, in peremptorily denying obedience to God's especial command, and perpetuating their frantic folly in their impious and impracticable attempt of the tower of Babel.

Yet in each succeeding age there appears to have been reserved ■ monument of Divine grace and favour, and a grand example of piety and virtue to cotemporaries; as we find after Noah, there was an Abraham, an Isaac, a Jacob, a Joseph, and at length a Moses, who was honoured with the appellation of the Friend of God, and being the peculiar instrument of conveying the immediate revelation of the Divine will to the people.

A curious view of the most signal events which occurred in the early ages of the Hebrew nation, will afford us a most striking display of the Divine attributes, mercy, and justice, as well as certain effects of human unbelief and impenitence. Disobedience succeeded calamity, and calamity deliverance. Obedience was almost instantaneously rewarded, and disobedience almost as instantaneously punished. The power of Omnipotence was exerted, and wonders of mercy and of vengeance were wrought; yet frail, sinful mortals were no sooner freed from the woes they deprecated, than they doubted the cause of such mighty effects, and presumptuously dared to set Omnipotence at defiance.

In succeeding times the same unbelief, the same impenitence, too generally prevailed; whilst the same tokens of the Divine approbation, and the Divine displeasure, respectively attended them. They had line upon line, and precept upon precept; were never without ■ shining example for imitation; yet a similarity of traits marked their character: they persisted in a faithless, desponding conduct, till their kingdom and city were reduced to ■ most desolate condition, and they could no longer be considered as a nation, but a people dispersed throughout all quarters of the earth, and subject to the vilest ignominy and contempt.

The History of the Jews affords a most important lesson to those who call themselves Christians, and a tremendous example to those who are too wise, or rather too wicked, to submit to the Divine will, as revealed in the Sacred Oracles. Our first parent aspired to an equality with his Creator: his presumption was checked by expulsion from the seat of bliss consummate, and consignment to mortality, with its attendant ills. The pride of the human heart has since too frequently presumed to explore the hidden purposes of Omniscience, and fallible beings have dared to attempt to scan the traces of unerring wisdom. Mature experience, and sober reflection, will demonstrate that infidelity is the most egregious folly. True wisdom will recur to its fountain, nor aspire to limits eccentric, and beyond its sphere. The Divine attributes are displayed with all lustre in the works of creation and Providence: we cannot turn our eyes, or our thoughts, on an object, but it impresses us with an idea of the Deity; or, in other words, "all Nature cries aloud through all her works there is a God."

To conclude, if the above remarks are admitted, it follows that, as the supreme and ultimate felicity of man consists in a conformity to the Divine will, and as that will is only communicated by Divine revelation, which holds forth competent instructions throughout the whole, it is his highest wisdom and happiness to receive the same with all the deference due to its origin, and to confirm himself and others in the belief and practice of it, by every means which his benevolent Creator hath put in his power.

FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS.

INTRODUCTION.

AS, in the course of the work we now offer to the public, prophecies occur, which not only coincide with, but corroborate the evidences for, the truth of what is called, by way of eminence, Sacred History in particular, as well as revealed religion in general, we presume that an illustration of the passages peculiarly alluded to, may be introduced with equal utility and propriety. Many eminent divines, and other learned men, unite in opinion, that nothing tends more effectually to confirm serious Christians in their most holy faith, or obviate the gainsayings of infidels, than a display of the time and manner in which events foretold by holy men, in ancient days, have been as remarkably as completely fulfilled.

Those who admit that the all-pervading mind not only comprehends whatever is present and past, but, with one intuitive view, discerns whatever is to happen in future, must readily acknowledge the power of an omnipotent Jehovah, to communicate his will and pleasure to such of his creatures, and in such way and manner, as seemeth meet to his infinite wisdom. Yet, though it is the sole prerogative of the Almighty, and it has been his pleasure, to appoint and commission certain chosen agents to prophecy things to come, there have not been wanting, in all ages, men disposed to carp, cavil, and impiously aver their incredibility.

But all their efforts combined cannot invalidate demonstrative evidence, or subvert facts founded on the basis of truth. Such as review, with an impartial eye, events recorded in history, both sacred and prophane, which, in this instance, throw great light on each other, must discover every truth of authenticity that can be had in points of this kind. They will also find things foretold in plain and explicit terms, though the period of accomplishment was not at those times ascertained. They will also find their completion in ages following, and that in a manner corresponding with their predictions. What clearer evidence, what more demonstrative proof can be required? Nothing surely can withstand them, but the most perverse contumacy, and hardened infidelity.

The Divine prophecies have been fulfilling for a series of time: some are past, and others are actually fulfilling at this day; so that we have confirmation stronger than our progenitors, and are consequently more unpardonable, if we reject matters of such indisputable veracity: "for many righteous men have desired to see those things which ye see, and have not seen them; and to hear those things which ye hear, and have not heard them." Matt. xiii. 17. In a word, what served to exercise their faith, now serves to confirm the opinion and judgment of us who live in this latter age. It appears then manifestly, that those who deny the authenticity of the prophecies contained in the sacred volume particularly, must have renounced all mental conviction, and the evidence of their very senses, and that they are as grossly stupid as they are flagrantly impious.

When we cite the particular prophecies mentioned by our author, place them in a comparative view with those in holy writ, produce and comment on the time and manner of their respective completions, we hope it will be attended with advantage to our readers, and answer the main design of our labour in this undertaking, which we solemnly declare, is, by endeavouring to illustrate an important part of prophane history, to lead them to a perfect knowledge of those things that pertain to their everlasting interest, to the grand fountain of truth, the infallible word of God.

C H A P. I.

Noah foretells the future state and condition of his posterity.

The prophecy of Noah.

WE find in Josephus, as well as the sacred writings, that as soon as the earth began to recover its former state, after the dire effects of the late tremendous deluge, Noah applied himself to the cultivation of the ground, planting of vineyards, gathering and pressing the grapes, and producing a store of wine.

It is farther related, that the patriarch, though a pious and virtuous man, having, after an oblation to the bountiful author of every good and perfect gift, drank too liberally of the liquor, became intoxicated to a degree of insensibility, and laid himself down in a manner that exposed him to shame. His son Ham, seeing the situation of his aged parent, called his brethren, in derision, to sport with a spectacle that could not but shock minds the least susceptible of the emotions of filial tenderness. Out of pious reverence, therefore, the other sons, Shem and Japheth, brought a covering, and veiled the shame of their father.

Pronounces his blessing on Shem and Japheth

When Noah recovered his senses, and understood what had passed, he pronounced a blessing upon his other children, after the good office they had rendered him, and at the same time a bitter imprecation upon the descendants of Ham; and this prophetic malediction was followed, as will appear hereafter, with a Divine vengeance. Ham, indeed, in his own person, escaped the curse, from a tender regard in Noah to the ties of consanguinity. But it is now necessary to advert to sacred history.

His malediction against the posterity of Ham.

The form of the malediction runs thus: "Cursed be Canaan. A servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren. Blessed be the Lord God of Shem, and Canaan shall be his servant. God shall enlarge Japheth. And he shall dwell in the tents of Shem, and Canaan shall be his servant." Gen. ix. 25, 26, 27.

It will appear, upon due reflection and attention to future events, that neither blessing or malediction so immediately relate to the children of Noah, as to their posterity, and the nations by them respectively founded; and also that it pleased the Judge of all the earth to display his moral government of the world, his approbation of virtue and aversion to vice, in the reward of the one, and the punishment of the other; for which wise and equitable purpose he endued Noah with a prophetic spirit, to make known his will to succeeding generations. To confine the word and spirit of ancient prophecy to individuals, or even particular persons, argues a total misconception of them; on the contrary, we must allow them a larger latitude, a more extensive scope; we must consider them as referring to numerous bodies collected, even to whole nations, whereby we shall be enabled to form a right judgment of the Divine superintendence over human affairs, and reconcile the various dispensations of Providence.

On this principle, therefore, we must suppose the curse of servitude pronounced upon Canaan, as well as the blessing of freedom promised to Shem and Japheth, not immediately relating to them personally considered, but as in an enlarged and extensive view, comprehending their whole race. So, indeed, as before observed, we must judge of scripture prophecy in general.

The malediction then uttered prophetically by the patriarch Noah, in fact referred to the race of Canaan, from his name called Canaanites, and from whose iniquities the Omniscient Being delegated his ancient servant to foretel that curse which was most justly due to their common degeneracy. And it was the evident design of the inspired penman, Moses, in relating the same, to encourage the Hebrews or Israelites in waging a necessary war against an abandoned race, who had renounced all claims to the favour and protection of heaven, and were therefore deemed to servitude from an early date.

Having thus pointed out the purport and meaning of this prophecy, it now remains that we proceed to display the manner in which it was fully completed.

It is certain the Canaanites were a most wicked and abandoned people, and it was for their great sins that the Almighty was pleased to inflict a most severe punishment not only on them, but their posterity. They were addicted to practise the worst kinds of Idolatry. Their religion was bad, and their morals worse; for corrupt religion and corrupt morals usually generate each other. Was not, therefore, a curse, in the nature of things, as well as in the just judgment of God, entailed on such a people and nation as this? It was not for the righteousness of the Israelites that the Lord was pleased to give them the possession of the land of Canaan, but for the wickedness of the people did he drive them out of the country; and he would have driven out the Israelites in like manner, had they been guilty of the like abominations. See Levit. xviii. 24, &c.

The Canaanites were punished for their wickedness.

The curse pronounced on the descendants of Ham particularly implies servitude and subjection. "Cursed be Canaan. A servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren." The descendants, therefore, of Canaan were to be subject to the descendants of Shem and Japheth; and the natural consequence of vice, in communities as well as in single persons, is subjection, slavery, and death.

Nature of the curse pronounced on the descendants of Ham.

This part of the prophecy, however, was not fulfilled till several centuries after it was delivered by Noah, when the Israelites, who were the descendants of Shem, under the command of Joshua, invaded the country of the Canaanites, smote above thirty of their kings, took possession of their land, and made the Gibeonites and others servants and tributaries; and the rest were after subdued by Solomon. The Greeks and Romans, who were the descendants of Japheth, not only subdued Syria and Palestine, but also pursued and conquered such of the Canaanites as were any where remaining; as for instance, the Tyrians and Carthaginians; the former of whom were ruined by Alexander and the Grecians, and the latter by Scipio and the Romans. From that period the miserable remainder of these people have been slaves; first to the Saracens, who descended from Shem, and afterwards to the Turks, who descended from Japheth; and under whose dominion great numbers of them at present remain.

Having thus explained the fulfilment of that part of Noah's prophecy relative to the descendants of his son Ham, let us now consider the promises he made to Shem and Japheth. And he said, "Blessed be the Lord God of Shem; and Canaan shall be his servant." The wickedness of men proceedeth from themselves, but their good from God; and therefore we find the old patriarch, in a strain of devotion, breaketh forth into thanksgiving to God as the author of all good to Shem. God can certainly bestow his particular favours according to his good pleasure; and salvation was to be derived to mankind through Shem and his posterity. By the Lord being called the God of Shem, is plainly intimated, that the Lord would be his God in a particular manner.

The promise made to Shem.

The promise made to Japheth was this: "God shall enlarge Japheth, and he shall dwell in the tents of Shem; and Canaan shall be his servant." That Japheth was more enlarged than the rest is evident, he having much greater possessions, and a more numerous offspring than either of his brothers. The territories of Japheth's posterity were very large; for, besides all Europe, great and extensive as it is, they possessed the lesser Asia, Media, part of Armenia, Iberia, Albania, and those great regions towards towards the north, which were anciently inhabited by the Scythians, and at present by the Tartars.

That the progeny of Japheth was enlarged, as well as his territories, evidently appears from the 10th chapter of Genesis, wherein we find that Japheth had seven sons, whereas Ham had only four, and Shem only five. The expression "and he shall dwell in the tents of Shem" is capable of a double construction; for thereby may be meant either that God, or that Japheth, shall dwell in the tents of Shem. Those who prefer the former construction, found their authority on the literal sense of the words in the text, there being no other noun to govern the verbs in the period than the word God. The whole sentence, therefore, according to this, should run thus, God will enlarge Japheth, and will dwell in the tents of Shem. But let the sense of this expression be taken either way, it is certain that the prophecy hath been most punctually fulfilled. In the former sense it was fulfilled literally when the Shechinah, or Divine Presence, rested on the ark, and dwelt in the tabernacle and temple of the Jews. In the latter sense it was fulfilled first, when the Greeks and Romans, who sprung originally from Japheth, subdued and possessed Judea, and other countries of Asia, belonging to Shem; and again spiritually, when they were profelyted to the true religion; and those who were not Israelites by birth, became Israelites by faith.

This first prophecy of Noah's is certainly a most extraordinary one indeed. It was delivered near four thousand years ago, and yet hath been fulfilling through the several periods of time to this day. It is both wonderful and instructive; and is, as it were, an epitome of the history of the world.

CHAP. II.

Of the prophecies concerning Ishmael, the son of Abraham, by his hand-maid Hagar.

AFTER Noah, the next great patriarch we meet with in the Old Testament is the pious Abraham, who was favoured with several Divine revelations. From him two very extraordinary nations descended, namely, the Ishmaelites and Israelites, concerning each of which people there are some prophecies of the most extraordinary nature.

Ishmael was the son of Abraham, by his hand-maid Hagar, who was an Egyptian; and though he was not properly the child of promise, yet he was distinguished by some express predictions, for the comfort and satisfaction of both his parents.

After Hagar had fled from the face of her mistress Sarah, who had dealt hardly with her, (see Gen. xvi.) the angel of the Lord found her in the wilderness, and said unto her, "Return to thy mistress, and submit thyself under her hands. And the angel of the Lord said unto her, I will multiply thy seed exceedingly, that it shall not be numbered for multitude. And the angel of the Lord said unto her, Behold, thou art with child, and shalt bear a son, and shalt call his name Ishmael, because the Lord hath heard thy affliction. And he will be a wild man: his hand will be against every man, and every man's hand against him; and he shall dwell in the presence of all his brethren."

We find, in the succeeding chapter, that God promises Abraham a son by his wife Sarah, whom he should call Isaac; but, notwithstanding this, he still reserved a blessing for Ishmael. "Behold" (said he) "I have blessed him, and will make him fruitful, and will multiply him exceedingly: twelve princes shall he beget, and I will make him a great nation." After this, when Hagar and Ishmael were sent forth into the wilderness, God said unto Abraham, "And also of the son of the bondwoman will I make a nation, because he is thy seed." Gen. xxi. 13. And the same is repeated to Hagar, (ver. 18.) "I will make him a great nation."

Now, if we attend to the particulars mentioned in this prophecy, and trace the course of events which afterwards took place, we shall find the whole strictly fulfilled, and that a part of it is fulfilling even at this present period. "I will multiply thy seed exceedingly, and it shall not be numbered for multitude." And again, "Behold, I have blessed him, and will make him fruitful, and will multiply him exceedingly." From these two passages it is manifestly evident that the prophecy does not so much relate to Ishmael himself, as it does to his descendants, whom it is foretold shall be exceeding numerous; and this part of the prediction was most amply fulfilled.

Hagar, the mother of Ishmael, was an Egyptian; and when he grew to a state of manhood, he married a woman of the same country. In the course of a few years his own children and their descendants became so numerous, that they formed a considerable body of people, and were particularly distinguished for the great traffic they carried on in different parts of Egypt. After this Ishmael's descendants were greatly multiplied in the Hagarenes, who were probably so called from his mother Hagar; in the Nabathæans, who were so denominated from his son Nabaioth; in the Itureans, who were so called from his son Jetur, or Itur; and in the Arabs, (especially the Scenites and Saracens,) who over-ran a great part of the world; and his descendants the Arabs are at this day a very numerous people.

That part of the prophecy which says, "Twelve princes shall he beget," is of a very particular nature indeed; notwithstanding which it was most strictly fulfilled. The names of these princes are recorded by Moses, who, after mentioning them, says, "These are the sons of Ishmael, and these are their names, by their towns, and by their castles: twelve princes according to their nations." Gen. xxv. 16. We are not, however, to understand by this expression, that they were so many distinct sovereign princes, but only the heads of so many clans, or tribes. Strabo frequently mentions the Arabian phylarchs, (as he denominates them,) or rulers of tribes: and Melo, an heathen historian, tells us, "That Ishmael had, by his Egyptian wife, twelve sons, who, departing into Arabia, divided the region between them, and were the first kings of the inhabitants; whence (even to our days, says he) the Arabians have had twelve kings of the same names as the first." After the time of Melo, the Arabs were governed by what was then called phylarchs, and lived in tribes; and this they still continue to do, as appears by the testimony of Thevenot, Middleton, and other modern travellers.

"And I will make him a great nation." This part of the prophecy is repeated several times, and, as soon as the regular course of nature would admit, was fully accomplished. The descendants of Ishmael, in process of time, grew up into a great nation; such they continued for several ages; and, when we consider the prodigious numbers of them that still inhabit the country, they may be justly called "a great nation."

"And he will be a wild man." Ishmael and his posterity were to be wild, fierce, savage, ranging in the deserts, and not easily softened to society; and whoever has read the accounts given of these people by different travellers, must know it to be a true and genuine character. It is said of Ishmael (Gen. xxi. 20.) that "he dwelt in the wilderness, and became an archer;" and the same is no less true of his descendants than of himself. "He dwelt in the wilderness;" and his descendants still inhabit the same wilderness; and many of them, from the best accounts we have, both ancient and modern, are total strangers to agriculture, neither sowing or planting, but living entirely by plunder and rapine. "And he became an archer." Such were the Itureans and mighty men of Keder, mentioned by Isaiah, chap. xxi. 17. and such the Arabs have been from the beginning to the present time. It was very late before they admitted the use of fire arms arms in their country; and the greater part of them are still strangers to that instrument of defence: for they constantly practise the bow and arrow, and are esteemed the most skilful archers in the universe.

“And he shall dwell in the presence of his brethren;” that is, shall dwell in tents, as many of the Arabs do at the present time.

If we reflect on this part of the prophecy, we shall, on the first view, think it very extraordinary, that “his hand should be against every man, and every man’s hand against him,” and yet that he should be able to “dwell in the presence of all his brethren.” But, extraordinary as it was, this also hath been fulfilled, not only in the person of Ishmael, but likewise in his descendants. With respect to Ishmael himself, the sacred historian tells us, that “the years of the life of Ishmael were an hundred and thirty and seven years, and he died “in the presence of all his brethren.” Gen. xxv. 17, 18. As for his posterity, they dwelt likewise in the presence of all their brethren; and they still subsist a distinct people, and inhabit the country of their progenitors, notwithstanding the perpetual enmity between them and the rest of mankind.

It may be supposed by some, that the reason why these people were never subdued by any other nation is, that the country was never worth conquering, and that its barrenness has ever been its preservation; but this is a mistake; for, by all the accounts we have, though the greater part of it be sandy and barren deserts, yet here and there are interspersed beautiful spots, and fruitful vallies. One part of the country was anciently known and distinguished by the name of Arabia the Happy, which appellation it received on account of the natural fertility of the soil, in contrast to the barrenness of the other parts. The whole country of Arabia is, by the oriental writers, generally divided into five provinces, the chief of which is called Yaman, and is thus described by the learned Mr. Sale, in his preface to the Alcoran. “The province of Yaman (says he) has been famous, from all antiquity, for the wholesomeness of its climate, its fertility, and riches. The delightfulness and plenty of it are owing to its mountains; for all that part which lies along the Red Sea is a dry barren desert, in some places ten or twelve leagues over, but, in return, bounded by those mountains, which being well watered, enjoy an almost continual spring, and yield great plenty and variety of fruits, and in particular excellent corn, grapes, and spices. The soil of the other provinces is much more barren than that of Yaman, the greater part being covered with dry sands, or rising into rocks, interspersed here and there with some fruitful spots, which receive their greatest advantages from their water and palm trees.”

But, however fertile, or however barren and desolate, this country might be, yet it was certainly the interest of the neighbouring princes and states, at all hazards, to endeavour to root out such a pestilent race of robbers. This, indeed, has several times been attempted, but never accomplished. They have, from first to last, maintained their independence; and, notwithstanding the most powerful efforts have been made to destroy them, they still “dwell in the presence of all their brethren,” and in the presence of all their enemies.

On a judicious and circumspect view of the respective particulars contained in this amazing prophecy, with the astonishing manner in which each article has been fulfilled, we shall easily perceive that the whole, from beginning to end, was guided by the direction of Providence. The sacred historian tells us, that these prophecies concerning Ishmael were delivered partly by the angel of the Lord, and partly by God himself: and, indeed, who but God, or one raised and commissioned by him, could describe so particularly the genius and manners, not only of a single person before he was born, but of a whole people, from the first founder of the race to the present time? It was certainly very wonderful, and not to be foreseen by human sagacity or prudence, that a man’s whole posterity should so nearly resemble him, and retain the same inclinations, the same habits, and the same customs throughout all ages. The waters of the purest spring or fountain are soon changed and polluted in their course; and the farther still they flow, the more they are incorporated and lost in other waters. How have the modern Italians degenerated from the courage and virtues of the old Romans? How are the French and English polished and refined from the barbarism of the ancient Gauls and Britons? In general, men and manners change with the times: but, in all changes and revolutions, the Arabs have continued the same from the beginning. They still remain the same fierce, savage, untractable, unsocial people they were at first, following in every thing their great ancestor, and being entirely different from the rest of their fellow creatures.

Disposition of the Arabians.

The great affinity that still subsists between the present Arabs and their progenitor Ishmael, from whom they descended, will appear evident from the following circumstances. Ishmael was circumcised, and so are his posterity to this day; and as Ishmael was circumcised when he was thirteen years of age, so are the Arabs at the same time. Ishmael was born of Hagar, who was a concubine; and the Arabs still indulge themselves in the use of mercenary wives and concubines. He lived in tents in the wilderness, shifting from place to place; and so do his descendants, even to the present time. He was an archer in the wilderness, and so are they. He was to be the father of twelve princes, or heads of tribes; and they live in clans or tribes to this day. He was a wild man, “his hand against every man, and every man’s hand against him;” and they still live in the same state of war, their hand against every man, and every man’s hand against them.

If we reflect on these strange circumstances, how wonderful must it appear to us, that the same people should retain the same disposition for so many ages! But still how much more wonderful is it that, with this disposition, and this enmity against the whole world, they should still subsist an independent and free people! It cannot be pretended that no attempts were ever made to subdue them, for the greatest conquerors in the world have almost all, in their turns, attempted it, and some have been very near effecting it. Neither can it be pretended that the dryness or inaccessibility of their country hath been their preservation; for their country hath been often penetrated, but could never be entirely subdued. Large armies have found the means of subsistence in their country: none of their powerful invaders ever desisted on this account; and therefore, the reason of their having withstood every effort to conquer them, must be imputed to some other cause. This was certainly no less than the Divine interposition; and which will evidently appear, if we attend to the following very singular particulars.

Alexander was preparing an expedition against them, when an inflammatory fever cut him off in the flower of his age. Pompey was in the career of his conquest, when urgent affairs called him elsewhere. Cælius Gallus had penetrated far into their country, when a fatal disease destroyed great numbers of his men, and obliged him to return. Trajan besieged their capital city, but was defeated by thunder and lightning, whirlwinds, and other prodigies, and that as often as he renewed his assaults. Severus besieged the same city twice, and was twice repulsed from before it; and the historian Dion (a man of rank and character, though an heathen) plainly ascribes the defeat of these two emperors to the interposition of a Divine power.

In short, if we consider the whole matter in its proper light, we cannot fail being of the same opinion with this heathen historian; for, without a Divine interposition, how could a single nation stand out against the enmity of the whole world for any length of time, and much more for near four thousand years together? The great empires round them have have all, in their turns, fallen to ruin, while they have continued the same from the beginning, and are likely to continue the same to the end.

The Arabs are the only people, except the Jews, who have subsisted as a distinct people from the beginning; and in some respects they very much resemble each other, as will appear by the following comparisons:

1. The Arabs, as well as the Jews, are descended from Abraham; and both boast of their descent from that father of the faithful.

2. The Arabs, as well as the Jews, are circumcised; and both profess to have derived that ceremony from Abraham.

3. The Arabs, as well as the Jews, had originally twelve heads of tribes, who were their princes or governors.

4. The Arabs, as well as the Jews, marry among themselves, and in their own tribes.

5. The Arabs, as well as the Jews, are singular in several of their customs, and are standing monuments, to all ages, of the exactness of the Divine predictions, and of the veracity of Scripture History.

We have only one observation more to make on the fulfilment of the very singular particulars contained in the prophecy relative to Abraham and Ishmael, and that is, that they are so incontrovertible as to defeat every attempt that can be made to place them in a fallacious light. We know the predictions delivered to Ishmael to be daily verified in his descendants, and therefore have, as it were, ocular demonstration for our faith; which is proving, by plain matter of fact, that "the Most High ruleth in the kingdoms of men," and that his truth, as well as his mercy, "endureth for ever."

CHAP. III.

Containing an account of the prophecies concerning Jacob and Esau, the sons of Isaac.

Prophecies concerning Jacob and Esau.

IT having pleased the Almighty to disclose unto Abraham the state and condition of his posterity by Ishmael, who was the son of the bond-woman, he was likewise pleased to predict some things of a much more important nature concerning the posterity of Isaac, who was the son of his wife Sarah. This son was properly the child of promise; and the prophecies relating to him and his family, are much more numerous than those relating to Ishmael and his descendants.

Previous to the birth of Ishmael, the Almighty was pleased to make this promise to Abraham; "In thee shall all families of the earth be blessed." Gen. xii. 3. But after the birth of Ishmael by Hagar, and Isaac by Sarah, the promise was limited to Isaac: "for in Isaac shall thy seed be called." Gen. xxi. 12. And accordingly to Isaac was the promise repeated, "In thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed;" which plainly intimated, that the Saviour of the world was not to come from the family of Ishmael, but from the descendants of Isaac.

The land of Canaan promised to the descendants of Abraham.

The land of Canaan was promised to Abraham and his descendants four hundred years before they obtained possession of it, and it was afterwards promised to his son Isaac: "Sojourn in this land (says the Lord unto Isaac) and I will be with thee, and will bless thee: for unto thee and unto thy seed I will give all these countries, and I will perform the oath which I swore unto Abraham thy father."

Obtained by means of Ishmael.

This promise was strictly fulfilled soon after the death of Moses, when the Israelites got possession of the land of Canaan through the assistance and protection of Joshua, who succeeded Moses in the government of the people. In pursuance of these prophesies, they remained in possession for several ages; and afterwards, when, for their sins and iniquities, they were to be removed from it, their removal also was foretold, both the carrying away of the ten tribes, and the captivity of the two remaining tribes for seventy years; as likewise their final captivity and dispersion into all nations.

Abraham received a promise from God, that his posterity should be multiplied exceedingly above that of others. "I will make of thee a great nation;" and "in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea-shore." See Gen. xii. 2. xxii. 17. The like promise was also continued to Isaac: "I will make thy seed to multiply as the stars of heaven." Gen. xxvi. 4.

Not to mention the great increase of the other posterity of Abraham and Isaac, how soon did their descendants by Jacob grow up to a mighty nation, and how numerous were they formerly in the land of Canaan? How numerous were they likewise in various other parts of the world? And after innumerable massacres and persecutions which they have undergone, how numerous are they still in their present dispersion among all nations?

Isaac had two sons, the one named Jacob, and the other Esau. The descendants of these sons did not incorporate themselves together as one people, but separated into two different nations; and therefore as it had been before specified which of the two, Ishmael or Isaac, was to be heir of the promises made to Abraham, so there was a necessity now for the same distinction to be made between Esau and Jacob, the sons of Isaac.

Jacob and Esau.

This was accordingly done, and that in the most ample and clear manner. When Rebecca, their mother, had conceived, "the children struggled together within her," Gen. xxv. 22; and she received the following Divine revelation: "Two nations are in thy womb, and two manner of people shall be separated from thy bowels, and the one people shall be stronger than the other people, and the elder shall serve the younger." Gen. xxv. 23.

The same Divine Spirit influenced and directed their father to give his final benediction to the like purpose: for thus did he bless Jacob: "God give thee of the dew of heaven and the fatness of the earth, and plenty of corn and wine. Let people serve thee, and nations bow down to thee: be lord over thy brethren, and let thy mother's sons bow down to thee: cursed be every one that curseth thee, and blessed be he that blesseth thee." Gen. xxvii. 28, 29. And thus did he bless Esau: "Behold, thy dwelling shall be the fatness of the earth, and of the dew of heaven from above. And by thy sword shalt thou live, and shalt serve thy brother: and it shall come to pass when thou shalt have the dominion, that thou shalt break his yoke from off thy neck."

Isaac's benediction to his son Jacob.

But, for greater clearness and certainty, a more express revelation was afterwards made to Jacob; and the land of Canaan, a numerous progeny, and the blessing of all nations, were promised to him in particular. "I am the Lord God of Abraham thy father, and the God of Israel: the land whereon thou liest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed. And thy seed shall be as the dust of the earth; and thou shalt spread abroad to the west, and to the east, and to the north, and to the south; and in thee and in thy seed shall the families of the earth be blessed." Gen. xxviii. 13, 14.

Canaan promised to Jacob.

This prophecy, as well as those before mentioned, was not to be verified in the persons of Esau and Jacob, but in those of their posterity. Jacob was so far from bearing rule over Esau, that he was forced to fly his country for fear of him. He continued abroad several years, and when he returned, he sent a servant before, with a supplicatory message, to his brother Esau, requesting "that he might find grace in his sight." When he heard of Esau's coming coming to meet him with four hundred men, he "was greatly afraid and distressed," and cried unto the Lord, "Deliver me, I pray thee, from the hand of my brother, from the hand of Esau." Gen. xxxii. 11. He sent a magnificent present before him to appease his brother, calling him lord, and himself his servant. When he met him, he "bowed himself to the ground seven times, until he came near to his brother:" and after he had found a gracious reception, he made this acknowledgment: "I have seen thy face as though I had seen the face of God, and thou wast pleased with me."

At this time Jacob had no temporal superiority over his brother Esau; and therefore we must look for the completion of the prophecy among their descendants. The prophecy itself makes plainly "two nations," and "two manner of people," and comprehends these several particulars; that the families of Esau and Jacob should grow up into two different people and nations; that the family of the elder should be subject to that of the younger; that, in situation, and other temporal advantages, they should be much alike; that the elder branch should delight more in war and violence, but yet should be subdued by the younger; that, however, there should be a time when the elder should have dominion, and shake off the yoke of the younger; but, in all spiritual gifts and graces, the younger should be greatly superior, and be the happy instrument of conveying the blessing to all nations.

The descendants of Esau and Jacob.

By the first part of the prophecy, "Two nations are in thy womb," &c. we find that they (that is, their posterity) were not only to grow up into two nations, but into two very different nations. And have not the Edomites (who were descended from Esau) and the Israelites (who were descended from Jacob) been all along two very different people in their manners, customs, and religions, which made them to be perpetually at variance with each other?

"And the children struggled together within her." This was a token of their future disagreement, and was fully evinced when they grew up to a state of manhood, by their different dispositions and inclinations. Esau was "a cunning hunter," and delighted in the sports of the field; but Jacob was more mild and gentle, "dwelling in tents," and minding his sheep and cattle. Esau slighted his birth right, and those sacred privileges of which Jacob was desirous, and is therefore called the profane Esau, (Heb. xii. 16.) but Jacob was a man of better faith and religion. The like diversity ran through their posterity. The descendants of Jacob were strict observers of the Jewish religion; but those of Esau, (whatever they were at first,) became, in process of time, the grossest idolaters. From these religious differences, and on other accounts, there was a continual grudge and enmity between the two nations. The king of Edom would not suffer the Israelites, in their return out of Egypt, so much as to pass through his territories; and the history of the Edomites after, is little more than the history of the wars between them and the Jews.

"And the one people shall be stronger than the other people, and the elder shall serve the younger." The family of Esau was the elder, and, for sometime, the greater and more powerful, of the two, there having been dukes and kings in Edom, before there reigned any king over the "children of Israel." Gen. xxxvi. 31. But David and his captains made an entire conquest of the Edomites, slew several thousands, compelled the rest to become his tributaries and servants, and planted garrisons among them to secure their obedience. See 2 Sam. viii. 14.

The Edomites, after being reduced to subjection by David and his captains, continued in a state of servitude for about an hundred and fifty years, and, instead of having a king of their own, were governed by viceroys, or deputies, appointed by the kings of Judah. In the days of Jehoram, the son of Jehoshaphat, they revolted, recovered their liberties, "and made a king over themselves." 2 Kings viii. 20. But, after this, they were again reduced by several of the princes of Judah at different periods, and most of their principal places destroyed. Judas Maccabeus attacked and defeated them several times, killing no less than twenty thousand at one time, and upwards of the like number at another. He likewise took their chief city Hebron, and destroyed all the towers and fortresses about it. At length Hyrcanus, the nephew of Judas Maccabeus, took what few cities they had left, and reduced them to the necessity of either embracing the Jewish religion, or leaving their country, and seeking new habitations elsewhere. They thought proper to chuse the former; in consequence of which they submitted themselves to be circumcised, became proselytes to the Jewish religion, and were ever after incorporated with those very people whom they had before considered as their enemies.

It is predicted, in one part of this remarkable prophecy, that, in point of situation, and other temporal advantages, Esau and Jacob should be much alike. It was said to Jacob, "God give thee of the dew of heaven, and of the fatness of the earth, and plenty of corn and wine." And much the same was said to Esau; "Behold, thy dwelling shall be of the fatness of the earth, and of the dew of heaven from above." Jacob's situation was in a very fertile and pleasant country; nor was that of Esau's less so. Mount Seir, and the adjacent country, were, at first, in the possession of the Edomites; after which they extended themselves farther into Arabia, as also into the southern parts of Judea. But, in whatever part they were situated, we find that the Edomites, in temporal advantages, were little inferior to the Israelites, having cattle, and beasts, and substance in abundance. At the time that the Israelites were on their return from Egyptian bondage, the country in which the Edomites then lived, abounded with the most fruitful fields and vineyards, as evidently appears from the manner of the request then made by the Israelites, for permission to pass through those territories. "Let us pass, I pray thee, through the country; we will not pass through the fields, or through the vineyards, neither will we drink of the water of the wells."

In another part of the prophecy it was predicted, that Esau should delight more in war and violence than his brother, but that he should be subdued by Jacob: "And by thy sword shalt thou live, and shalt serve thy brother." Esau himself might be said to live much by the sword, for he was "a cunning hunter," a man of the field. He and his posterity obtained possession of Mount Seir by force and violence, by destroying and expelling from thence the Horites, who were the former inhabitants. By what means they spread themselves farther into Arabia we are not informed; but it appears that, upon a sedition among them, which occasioned a separation, the greater part seized upon the south-west parts of Judea, during the Babylonish captivity, and afterwards made that their fixed place of residence.

Both before and after this, the Edomites were almost continually at war with the Jews, and upon every occasion were ready to join with their enemies. Even long after they were subdued by the Jews, they still retained the same violent spirit, as appears by the character given of them by Josephus to the following effect: "They were (says he) a turbulent and disorderly nation, always ready for commotions, and rejoicing in changes; at the least request of those who be sought them beginning war, and hastening to battles as it were to a feast." This character, given them by Josephus, appears very just; for, a little before the last siege of Jerusalem, they went, at the entreaty of the zealots, to assist them against the priests and people, and there, together with the zealots, murdered Ananias, the high priest, and committed the most unheard of cruelties.

There was, however, to be a time when the elder should have the dominion, and shake off the yoke of the younger. "And it shall come to pass, when thou shalt have dominion, that thou shalt break

"his yoke from off thy neck." It is not here said or meant that the Edomites should have dominion over the seed of Jacob, but simply have dominion, as they had when they appointed a king of their own. The whole of this sentence is, in the Jerusalem Targum, thus paraphrased: "And it shall be when the sons of Jacob attend to the law, and observe the precepts, they shall impose the yoke of servitude upon thy neck; but when they shall turn away themselves from studying the law, and neglect the precepts, behold then thou shalt shake off the yoke of servitude from thy neck."

It was David who imposed the yoke on the Edomites, (at which time the Jewish people strictly observed the law,) and it was very galling from the first. Towards the latter end of Solomon's reign, Hadad, the Edomite of the blood royal, who had been carried into Egypt in his childhood, returned into his own country, and raised some disturbances, but was not able to recover his throne, his subjects being over-awed by the garrisons which David had placed among them; and in the reigns of the succeeding princes of Judea they were totally subdued.

We come now to the last part of the prophecy, which predicts that, in all spiritual gifts and graces, the younger should be greatly superior to the elder, and be the happy instrument of conveying the blessing to all nations. "In thee and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed." And hitherto are to be referred in their full force those expressions; "Let people serve thee, and nations bow down unto thee: cursed be every one that curseth thee, and blessed be he that blest thee." The same promise was made to Abraham in the name of God: "I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee." Gen. xii. 3.

Jacob more religious than Esau.

Jacob was a man of more religion, and believed the Divine promises more than Esau. The posterity of Jacob likewise preserved the true religion, and the worship of one God, while the Edomites were sunk into idolatry. Of the seed of Jacob was to be born the Saviour of the world. This was the peculiar privilege and advantage of Jacob, to be the happy instrument of conveying these spiritual blessings to all nations.

The Edomites abolished.

The whole of this prophecy, if properly traced from the beginning, will appear to have been most strictly fulfilled. We find the nation of the Edomites were several times conquered by, and made tributary to, the Jews, but never the nation of the Jews to the Edomites; and the Jews have been the more considerable people, more known in the world, and more famous in history. We have, indeed, very little more of the history of the Edomites than what is connected with that of the Jews: and where is the name or the nation at this time? They were swallowed up and lost, partly among the Nabathæan Arabs, and partly among the Jews; and, at length, the very name of them was abolished and disused.

Thus was fulfilled the prophecies of the other inspired men. See Jeremiah xlix. 7, &c. &c. Ezekiel xxv. 12, &c. Joel iii. 19. Amos i. 11, &c. and lastly, the prophet Obadiah. At this very time we see the Jews subsisting as a distinct people, while the Edomites are no more: and thus is amply fulfilled the words of the latter prophet: "For thy violence against thy brother Jacob, shame shall cover thee, and thou shalt be cut off for ever." And again, "there shall not be any remaining of the house of Esau, for the Lord hath spoken it." See Obadiah, ver. 10 and 18.

CHAP. IV.

Containing an account of the prophecies of Jacob relative to his posterity, but more particularly his son Judah.

WE find two promises in the blessing bestowed upon Jacob, one of which is of a temporal, and the other of a spiritual, nature. The first was the promise of the land of Canaan; and the second, the promise of the seed in which all the nations of the earth should be blessed. These promises were first made to Abraham, then repeated to Isaac, and afterwards confirmed to Jacob, who, a short time before his death, bequeathed them to his posterity.

The prophecies of Jacob.

The inheritance of the land of Canaan might be shared and divided among all his sons, but the blessed seed could descend only from one. Accordingly Jacob assigned to each a portion of the former, but limited the latter to the tribe of Judah; and, at the same time, sketched out the characters and fortunes of the different tribes into which the people were to be divided.

Joseph being the favourite son of Jacob, he adopted his two sons Manasseh and Ephraim for his own; but foretold, that the younger should be the greater of the two. This prediction was fulfilled in a very ample manner; for the tribe of Ephraim grew to be so numerous and powerful, that it was sometimes put for all the ten tribes of Israel.

Joseph his favorite son

Of Reuben, the elder son of Jacob, it is said, "Unstable as water, thou shalt not excel." Gen. xlix. 4. And what is there recorded great or excellent of the tribe of Reuben? In number and power they were inferior to several other tribes.

Jacob's prophecy of his son Reuben.

Of Simeon and Levi it is said, "I will divide them in Jacob, and scatter them in Israel." And was not this eminently fulfilled in the tribe of Levi, who had no portion or inheritance of their own, but were dispersed among the other tribes? Neither had the tribe of Simeon any inheritance properly of their own, but only a portion in the midst of the tribes of Judah, from whence several of them afterwards went in search of new habitations, and were thereby divided from the rest of their brethren.

Of Simeon and Levi.

Of Zebulun it is said, "He shall dwell at the haven of the sea, and shall be for an haven of ships." And accordingly the tribe of Zebulun extended from the Sea of Galilee to the Mediterranean, where they had commodious havens for ships.

Of Zebulun.

Of Benjamin it is said, "He shall raven as a wolf." And was not that a fierce and warlike tribe, as appears in several instances, and particularly in the case of the Levite's wife, when they alone waged war against all the other tribes, and overcame them in two battles. See Judges xx.

Of Benjamin.

In like manner Jacob characterizes all the other tribes, and foretells their temporal condition, and that of Judah as well as the rest. But to Judah he particularly bequeaths the spiritual blessing, and delivers it in much the same form of words as it was delivered to him. Isaac had said to Jacob, "Let people serve thee, and nations bow down to thee; be lord over thy brethren, and let thy mother's sons bow down to thee." Gen. xxvii. 29. And here Jacob saith to Judah, "Thou art he whom thy brethren shall praise; thy hand shall be in the neck of thine enemies; thy father's children shall bow down before thee." And it is added, "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a law-giver from between his feet, until Shiloh come, and unto him shall the gathering of the people be."

Of Judah.

There are several things to be attended to in this remarkable prophecy relative to Judah. We are told that Judah's brethren should "praise him," and that "his hand should be in the neck of his enemies." This was remarkably fulfilled in the local situation of the tribe of Judah; for their being so near the Arabians obliged them to be continually on their guard; and as they were, for the most part, successful, so it may be justly said, that "the hand of Judah was in the neck of his enemies," and that his brethren praised him for standing up in their defence. It is also said, that "his father's children should bow down before him;" and nothing was ever more literally fulfilled. David, in whose family the royal sovereignty was placed, was of the tribe of Judah, and to him all the other tribes bowed down.

Explanation of that part of Jacob's prophecies relative to his son Judah.

During

During the time of Joshua's wars with the Canaanites, the tribe of Judah was more distinguished for its valour than the others; and it appears, from the book of Judges, that they were always the most forward to engage with the common enemy. When it is said that "the scepter shall not depart from Judah," it implies, that it should depart from all those of the other tribes who should enjoy it. Thus it departed from the tribe of Benjamin on the death of Saul; and it is well known that the ten tribes were carried away captive, and incorporated with other nations, while that of Benjamin put itself under the protection of Judah.

The expression "until Shiloh come," evidently and incontestibly means till the coming of the Messiah.

"And unto him shall the gathering of the people be." If we understand this of Judah, that the other tribes should be gathered to that, it was in some measure fulfilled by the people going up so frequently as they did to Jerusalem, which was in the tribe of Judah, in order to obtain justice in difficult cases, and to worship God in his holy temple.

Upon the divisions of the kingdoms of Israel and Judah, the tribe of Benjamin, and the priests and Levites, and several out of all the other tribes, went over to Judah, and were so blended and incorporated together, that they are more than once spoken of as one tribe. And it is expressly said, (1 Kings xii. 20.) "there was none that followed the house of David, but the tribe of Judah only." All the rest were swallowed up in that tribe, and considered as parts and members of the same.

In like manner, when the Israelites were carried away captive into Assyria, it is said, "there was none left but the tribe of Judah only;" and yet we know that the tribe of Benjamin, and many of the other tribes, then remained; but they are reckoned as one and the same tribe with Judah. Nay, at that very time there was a remnant of Israel that escaped from the Assyrians, and went and adhered to Judah; for we find afterwards that, in the reign of Josiah, there were some of Manasseh and Ephraim, and of the remnant of Israel, who contributed money towards repairing the temple, as well as Judah and Benjamin. 2 Chron. xxxiv. 9. And, at the solemn celebration of the passover, some "of Israel were present" as well as "all Judah, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem." When the people returned from the Babylonish captivity, then again several of the tribes of Israel associated themselves, and returned with Judah and Benjamin. In short, at so many different times, and upon such different occasions, were the other tribes gathered to that of Judah, that the latter became the general name of the whole nation; and, after the Babylonish captivity, they were no longer called the "people of Israel," but the "Jews, or people of Judah."

The government of the tribe of Judah subsisted, in some form or other, from the death of Jacob to the last destruction of Jerusalem; but then it was utterly broken and ruined: then the scepter departed, and hath been departed from that time to the present.

It may not be improper here to add a just observation made on the subject by the learned prelate bishop Sherlock. "As the tribe of Benjamin (says he) annexed itself to the tribe of Judah as its head, so it ran the same fortune with it: they went together into captivity, they returned home together, and were both in being when Shiloh came. This also was foretold by Jacob, 'Benjamin shall raven as a wolf: in the morning he shall devour the prey, and at night he shall divide the spoil.' The morning and night here can be nothing else but the morning and night of the Jewish state; for this state is the subject of all Jacob's prophecy from one end to the other; and consequently it is here foretold of Benjamin, that he should continue to the very last times of the Jewish state. This interpretation is confirmed by Moses's prophecy; for the prophecy of Moses is, in truth, an exposition of Jacob's. 'Benjamin,' saith Moses, 'shall dwell in safety; the "Lord shall cover him all the day long." Deut. xxxiii. 12. What is this "all the day long?" The same certainly as "the morning and night." Does not, therefore, this import a promise of a longer continuance to Benjamin than to the other tribes? And was it not most exactly fulfilled?"

We shall only observe farther, with respect to this prophecy, that the completion of it furnishes us with an invincible argument, not only that the Messiah has come, but that our Blessed Redeemer is the very person. The scepter was not to depart from Judah until the Messiah should come; but the scepter hath long been departed, and consequently the Messiah hath been long come. The scepter departed at the final destruction of Jerusalem, and hath been departed now more than seventeen centuries, and consequently the Messiah came a little before that period; so that prejudice itself cannot long make any doubt concerning the reality of the person. Every man, therefore, of serious reflection, must say as Simon Peter said to Jesus, "Lord, to whom shall we go? thou hast the words of eternal life. And we believe and are sure that thou art the Christ, the son of the living God." John vi. 68, 69.

CHAP. V.

The prophecies of Moses, the great law-giver, concerning the Jews.

MOSES, a short time before his death, delivered many prophecies to the Jews, in which he predicted the great blessings that would be bestowed upon them, if they paid a proper attention to the laws he had given them; and, on the contrary, the heavy curses that would unavoidably fall upon them, if they became refractory and disobedient to the Divine will. These prophecies are contained in the 28th chapter of Deuteronomy; and the greater part of them relate to the curses that should fall on the Jews in case of their disobedience; all which have been since most strictly fulfilled, as will appear from the following observations.

These prophecies commence at the 49th verse of the before-mentioned chapter, in which it is said, "The Lord shall bring a nation against thee from far, from the end of the earth, as swift as the eagle that flieth, a nation whose tongue thou shalt not understand." This was fulfilled in the Chaldeans, who may be justly said to have come from far in comparison with the Moabites, Philistines, and others, who frequently invaded Judea, and committed depredations in various parts of the country.

The like description of the Chaldeans is given by the prophet Jeremiah: "Lo, I will bring a nation upon you from far, O house of Israel, saith the Lord: it is a mighty nation, it is an ancient nation, a nation whose language thou knowest not, neither understandest what thou say." Jeremiah v. 15. He likewise compares the enemies of the Jews to the eagles. "Our persecutors (says he) are swifter than the eagles of the heaven: they pursued us upon the mountains, they laid wait for us in the wilderness." Lam. iv. 9.

In the 50th verse of the 28th chapter of Deuteronomy, the people, who were to be the persecutors of the Jews, are thus farther characterized. And they shall be "a nation of fierce countenance, which shall not regard the person of the old, nor shew favour to the young." Such were the Chaldeans; and the sacred historian expressly saith, that, for the wickedness of the Jews, God "brought upon them the king of the Chaldees, who slew their young men with the sword, in the house of their sanctuary, and had no compassion upon young man or maiden, old men, or him that stooped for age; he gave them all into his hand." 2 Chron. xxxvi. 17.

According to the prophecy of Moses, the enemies of the Jews were to besiege and take their cities. "And

"And he shall besiege thee in all thy gates, until thy high and fenced walls come down wherein thou trustedst throughout all thy land." This was accordingly fulfilled; for "Sennacherib, king of Assyria, came up against all the fenced cities of Judah, and took them." 2 Kings xviii. 13. And Nebuchadnezzar, and his captains, took and spoiled Jerusalem, burnt the city and temple, and brake down the walls of Jerusalem round about." 2 Kings, xxv. 10.

The Romans likewise (as we are informed by Josephus, in his History of the Jewish Wars) demolished several fortified places before they besieged and destroyed Jerusalem. And the Jews who inhabited that city, may very justly be said to have "trusted in their high and fenced walls," for they confided in the strength and situation of Jerusalem, as the Jebusites (the former inhabitants of the place) had done before them: "Who shall come down against us? or who shall enter into our habitations?" Jeremiah xxi. 13.

Jerusalem, indeed, was a very strong place, and wonderfully fortified both by nature and art. And yet, how many times was it taken previous to its final destruction by Titus? It was taken by Shishak, king of Egypt, by Nebuchadnezzar, by Antiochus Epiphanes, by Pompey, by Socius, and, lastly, by Herod.

The Jews, in these sieges, were to suffer great hardships, but more particularly by famine. Accordingly, when the king of Assyria besieged Samaria, there was a great famine in that city; "and behold they besieged it, until an ass's head was sold for four pieces of silver, and the fourth part of a cab of doves dung for five pieces of silver." 2 Kings vi. 25. When Nebuchadnezzar besieged Jerusalem, "the famine prevailed in the city, and there was no bread for the people of the land." 2 Kings xxv. 3. And in the last siege of Jerusalem, by the Romans, there was a most dreadful famine in the city.

Thus was literally fulfilled the words of Moses, who says, the man's "eye shall be evil towards his brother, and towards the wife of his bosom, and towards his children, because he hath nothing left him in the siege, and in the straitness wherewith thine enemies shall distress thee in all thy gates:" and, in like manner, the woman's "eye shall be evil towards her husband of her bosom, and towards her son, and towards her daughter." See Deut. xxviii. 54, &c.

According to another part of this prophecy, great numbers of the Jews were to be destroyed. "And ye shall be left few in number, whereas ye were as the stars of heaven for multitude." Deut. xxviii. 62. Not to mention any other of the calamities and slaughters which they have undergone, there was, in the siege of Jerusalem, an infinite multitude that perished by famine. There certainly is not a nation upon the earth that hath been exposed to so many massacres and persecutions as the Jews. Their history abounds with them; and if God had not been pleased to have given them a promise of a numerous posterity, they must, many hundred years ago, have been totally extirpated.

The prophecy farther saith, that they should be carried into Egypt, and there sold for slaves. "And the Lord shall bring thee into Egypt again, with ships: and there ye shall be sold unto your enemies for bondmen and bondwomen." Deut. xxviii. 68. They had, indeed, come out of Egypt triumphant, but now they were to return thither as slaves. They had, on their coming out, walked through the sea as on dry land, but now they were to be carried thither in ships. They might be carried thither in the ships of the Tyrian or Sidonian merchants, or by the Romans, who had a fleet in the Mediterranean; and this was certainly a much safer way of conveying so many prisoners, then sending them by land.

No. 54.

That this part of the prophecy was fulfilled, evidently appears from various accounts. In the reigns of the two first Ptolemies, many of the Jews were sent into Egypt as slaves. And when Jerusalem was taken by Titus, he sent the greater part of those captives, who were upwards of seventeen years of age, to the works in Egypt: such as were under that age he sold for slaves; but so little care was taken of them, that no less than eleven thousand perished for want. This is confirmed by St. Jerome, who says, that, "after their last overthrow, many thousands of them were sold: that those who could not be sold, were transported into Egypt, and perished by shipwreck or famine, or were massacred by the inhabitants."

"And ye shall be plucked from off the land whither thou goest to possess it." Deut. xxviii. 63. This was amply fulfilled when the ten tribes were carried into captivity by the king of Assyria, and other nations were planted in their stead; and when the two other tribes were carried away captives to Babylon; besides other captives and transportations of the people at different periods. Afterwards, when the emperor Adrian had subdued the rebellious Jews, he published an edict, in which he not only forbade them, on pain of death, from setting foot in Jerusalem, but prohibited them from even entering into the country of Judea. From that time to the present, Judea has been in the possession of foreign lords and masters, few of the Jews dwelling in it, and those only of a very low and servile condition. This has been clearly proved by several modern travellers, particularly Mr. Sandys, who, in speaking of the Holy Land, says, "it is for the most part now inhabited by Moors and Arabians; the one possessing the vallies, and the other the mountains. Turks there be few; but many Greeks, with other Christians, of all sects and nations, such as impute to the place an adherent holiness. Here are also some Jews, yet they inherit no part of the land, but live as aliens in their own country."

The different tribes carried into captivity.

Thus have the Jews been "plucked from off the land which they possessed." But this was not all, for, according to the prophecy, they were to be dispersed into all nations: "And the Lord shall scatter thee among all people, from one end of the earth unto the other." Deut. xxviii. 64. These words were partly fulfilled in the Babylonish captivity; but they have been more amply fulfilled since the great dispersion of the Jews by the Romans. What people, indeed, have been scattered so far and wide as they? and where is the nation which is a stranger to them, or to which they are strangers? They swarm in many parts of the east, and are spread through most of the countries in Europe and Africa. In short, they are to be found in all places where there is a circulation of trade and money, and may, properly speaking, be called the brokers of the whole world.

It was likewise foretold by Moses, that, though they should be so dispersed, they should not be totally destroyed, but should still subsist as a distinct people: "And yet for all that, when they be in the land of their enemies, I will not cast them away, neither will I abhor them, to destroy them utterly, and to break my covenant with them." Levit. xxvi. 44. This part of the prophecy hath been most strictly fulfilled; for (as a celebrated writer observes) "the Jewish nation, like the bush of Moses, hath been always burning, but never consumed." And what an astonishing thing it is to think, that, after so many wars, battles, and sieges; after so many fires, famines, and pestilences; after so many rebellions, massacres, and persecutions; after so many years of captivity, slavery, and misery, they have not been utterly destroyed, but are still scattered among all nations, and subsist as a distinct people!

They were to suffer greatly in their dispersion, and not to rest long in any place. "And among these nations thou shalt find no ease, neither shall the sole of thy foot have rest." Deut. xxxiii. 65. This likewise hath been amply fulfilled; for so far far have they been from finding rest, that they have been banished from city to city, and from country to country. In many places they have been banished, recalled, and then banished again.

But they were not only to be banished from their own country, and dispersed into various parts throughout the world, but likewise, wherever they went, were to be "oppressed and spoiled evermore," and their "houses" and "vineyards," their "oxen" and "asses," to be taken from them. Deut. xxviii. 29, &c. That this has been strictly fulfilled, will evidently appear, when we consider the very frequent and great seizures that have been made of their effects in almost all countries. How often has heavy fines been laid on them by the princes of the different nations in which they have dwelt? and how often have they been obliged to secure their lives by the forfeiture of their possessions? Of this there have been innumerable instances, and some even in our own country. King Henry III. of England, always laid a heavy tax on the Jews at every low ebb of his fortunes. "One Abraham, (says a celebrated writer,) who was found a delinquent, was forced to pay seven hundred marks for his redemption. Aaron, another Jew, protested, that the king had taken from him, at times, thirty thousand marks of silver, besides two hundred marks of gold. And in like manner he used many others of the Jews." And when they were banished, in the reign of Edward I. all their estates were confiscated to the crown.

"Their sons and daughters should be given unto another people." Deut. xxviii. 32. This has been likewise fulfilled; for, in several countries, but more particularly in Spain and Portugal, their children have been taken from them, by order of the government, to be educated in the popish religion.

"And they should be mad for the sight of their eyes which they should see." Deut. xxviii. 34. That this part of the prophecy has been most amply fulfilled we have the clearest evidence; for into what madness, fury, and desperation, have they repeatedly been driven by the cruel usage, extortions, and oppressions, they have undergone at different periods, and in different parts of the world.

The prophecy farther tells us, that they "should become an astonishment, a proverb, and a by-word to all nations." Deut. xxviii. 37. And do we not hear and see this part of the prophecy fulfilled every day? Is not the avarice, usury, and hard-heartedness of a Jew grown proverbial? and are not their persons generally odious among all sorts of people? Mahometans, heathens, and Christians, however they may disagree in other points, yet generally agree in vilifying, abusing, and persecuting the Jews. In most places where they are tolerated, they live in a separate quarter by themselves, and wear some badge of distinction. Their very countenances commonly distinguish them from the rest of mankind; and they are, in all respects, treated as if they were of another species.

Lastly, "their plagues should be wonderful, even great plagues, and of long continuance." Deut. xxviii. 59. And have not their plagues continued upwards of seventeen hundred years? What nation hath suffered so much, and yet continued so long? What nation hath subsisted as a distinct people in their own country so long as these have done in their dispersion into all countries? And what a standing miracle is this exhibited to the view and observation of the whole world!

These astonishing prophecies were delivered upwards of three thousand years ago, and, from the fulfilment of them, which we see every day taking place in the world, are the strongest proofs that can be given of the Divine legation of Moses. They are truly, as Moses foretold they would be, "a sign and a wonder for ever. Moreover, all these curses shall come upon thee, and shall pursue thee and overtake thee, till thou be destroyed; because thou hearkenest not unto the voice of the Lord thy God, to keep his commandments, and his

"statutes which he commanded thee: and they shall be upon thee for a sign and for a wonder, and upon thy seed for ever." Deut. xxviii. 45, 46.

CHAP. VI.

The prophecies of Jeremiah, Isaiah, Micah, Ezekiel, and other prophets, relative to the Jews.

THE great legislator Moses was not the only person who foretold the punishments to be inflicted on the Jews for their manifold transgressions. The like was foretold by many other persons, who received the spirit of inspiration. These prophecies were delivered at different periods, and were designed to reform the Jews from the wicked course of life to which they were naturally addicted; but as they continued inflexible, the prophecies denounced against them were strictly fulfilled.

It was among others of the prophecies foretold, that the ten tribes of Israel should be carried away captives by the king of Assyria; and that the two remaining tribes of Judah and Benjamin should be made captives to the king of Babylon; but with this difference, that the two tribes should be restored, and return from their captivity, but the ten tribes should be totally annihilated. The captivity of the tribes was told.

The time when the captivity of the two tribes of Judah and Benjamin was to take place, as also that of their restoration, was foretold by the prophet Jeremiah. "This whole land shall be a desolation, and an astonishment; and these nations shall serve the king of Babylon seventy years." Jer. xxv. 11. And again, "Thus saith the Lord, that after seventy years be accomplished at Babylon, I will visit you, and perform my good word towards you, in causing you to return to this place." Jer. xxix. 10. The prophecy of Jeremiah.

This prophecy was delivered "in the fourth year of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah, which was the first year of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon." Jer. xxv. 1. In the same year the prophecy began to take place; for Nebuchadnezzar invaded Judea, besieged and took Jerusalem, made Jehoiakim his subject and tributary, and transported the finest children of the royal family, and of the nobility, to Babylon, to be brought up as slaves in his palaces. He likewise destroyed the temple, carried away the sacred vessels, and placed them in the temple of his idol Bel at Babylon. Almost the whole of the inhabitants of Judea and Jerusalem were carried into captivity, there being only a few, of very poor and mean condition, left to till and cultivate the land.

In this situation they remained for seventy years, when Cyrus, king of Babylon, issued a proclamation for the restoration of the Jews, and for the rebuilding of the temple of Jerusalem. In consequence of this the Jews immediately returned to their own country, and dispersed themselves into the respective cities they had formerly inhabited. The temple was begun, and carried on with great assiduity for some time, but, by the great interruption they met with from the Samaritans, was not finished till the reign of Darius, when all things were again restored to their former state. And thus was fulfilled the prophecy of Jeremiah, relative to the two tribes of Judah and Benjamin.

The prophecy against the ten tribes of Israel was much more severe than that against the other two. The tribe of Ephraim, which was the chief of these, is often put for the whole ten; and it was predicted that "within threescore and four years shall Ephraim be broken that it be not a people." Isaiah vii. 8. This prophecy was delivered in the first year of Ahaz, king of Judah, when Rezin, king of Syria, and Pekah, king of Israel, formed a conjunction to reduce Jerusalem; and it was to comfort Ahaz, and the house of David, in these difficulties and distresses, that the prophet Isaiah was commissioned to assure him, that the kings of Syria and Israel should remain only the heads of their respective cities; that they

they should not prevail against Jerusalem; and that, within sixty and five years, Israel should be so broken that it should be no more a people.

The fulfilment of this prophecy commenced in the reign of Ahaz, when Tiglath-pileser took many of the Israelites, "even the Reubenites, and the Gadites, and the half tribe of Manasseh, and all the land of Naphtali, and carried them captive into Assyria, and brought them unto Halah, and Habor, and Hara, and to the river Gozan." Chron. v. 26. 2 Kings xv. 29. His son Salmaneser, in the reign of Hezekiah, took Samaria, and carried away still greater numbers "unto Assyria, and put them in Holah and in Habor by the river of Gozan," (the same places where their brethren had been carried before them,) "and in the cities of the Medes." 2 Kings xviii. 11. His son Sennacherib came up also against Hezekiah, and all the fenced cities of Judah; but his army was miraculously defeated, and he himself was forced to return with shame and disgrace into his own country, where he was murdered by two of his sons. 2 Kings xvii. 19. Another of his sons, Esarhaddon, succeeded him on the throne; but it was some time before he could recover his kingdom from these disorders, and think of reducing Syria and Palestine again to his obedience: and then it was, and not till then, that he completed the ruin of the ten tribes, carried away the remains of the people, and, to prevent the land from becoming desolate, "brought men from Babylon, and from Cuthah, and from Hava, and from Hamath, and from Sepharvaim, and placed them in the cities of Samaria, instead of the children of Israel." 2 Kings xvii. 24. Ephraim was broken from being a kingdom before, but it was now broken from being a people. And from that time to this, what account can be given of the people of Israel as distinct from those of Judah? Where have they subsisted all this time? And where is their situation, or what their present condition?

At their first dispersion they were carried into Assyria and Media; and if they subsisted any where, it is reasonable to imagine they might be found there in great abundance. But this is not the case; neither are they to be found in any of those parts where it has been asserted, by different Jewish writers, they took up their residence. It is the opinion of some, that they returned into their own country, with the other two tribes, after the Babylonish captivity. The decree, indeed, of Cyrus, extended to "all the people of God;" Ezra i. 3. and that of Artaxerxes to "all the people of Israel;" vii. 13. and no doubt but many of the Israelites took advantage of these decrees, and returned with Zerubbabel and Ezra to their own cities. But still the main body of the ten tribes remained behind; and if the whole did not return at this time, they cannot be supposed to have returned in a body at any time after; for we do not read of any such circumstance in history, neither of the time or occasion of their return. The celebrated dean of Prideaux says, "the ten tribes of Israel, which had separated from the house of David, were brought to a full and utter destruction, and never after recovered themselves again. For those who were thus carried away, (excepting only some few who, joining themselves to the Jews in the land of their captivity, returned with them,) soon going into the usages and idolatry of the nations among whom they were planted, (to which they were too much addicted while in their own land,) after a time, became wholly absorbed, and swallowed up in them, and thence utterly losing their name, their language, and their memorial, were never after spoken of."

But if the whole race of Israel became thus extinct, and perished for ever, it may be asked, how can the numerous prophecies be fulfilled, which promise the future conversion and restoration of Israel as well as Judah? The truth we conceive to lie between these two opinions. Neither did they all return to Jerusalem, nor did all, who remained behind, comply with the idolatry of the Gentiles, among whom they lived. But whether they remained, or whether they returned, this prophecy of Isaiah was still fulfilled; the kingdom, the commonwealth, the state of Israel was utterly broken; they no longer subsisted as a distinct people from Judah; they no longer maintained a separate religion; they joined themselves to the Jews, from whom they had been unhappily divided; they lost the name of Israel as a name of distinction, and were thenceforth all in common called Jews.

It appears, from the book of Esther, that there were great numbers of Jews in all the hundred twenty and seven provinces of the kingdom of Ahasuerus, or Artaxerxes Longimanus, king of Persia, and they could not all be the remains of the two tribes of Judah and Benjamin, who had refused to return to Jerusalem with their brethren: they must, at least many of them, have been the descendants of the ten tribes, whom the kings of Assyria had carried away captive; but yet they are all spoken of as one and the same people: and all, without distinction, are denominated Jews.

We read, in the Acts of the Apostles, that there went to Jerusalem, to celebrate the feast of Pentecost, "Parthians, and Medes, and Elamites, and the dwellers in Mesopotamia." Acts ii. 9. These men came from the countries wherein the ten tribes had been placed, and, in all probability, were therefore some of their posterity; but yet these, as well as the rest, are styled "Jews, devout men, out of every nation under heaven." Acts ii. 5. Those also of the ten tribes, who returned to Jerusalem, united with the two tribes of Judah and Benjamin, and formed but one nation, one body of Jews. They might, perhaps, for some ages, have preserved their genealogies; but they were now incorporated together; and the distinction of tribes and families is, in a great measure, lost among them; and they have all, from the Babylonish captivity to this day, been comprehended under the general name of Jews.

There were many persons of all the ten tribes in being during the time of St. Paul's ministry; for he speaketh of "the twelve tribes hoping to attain to the promise of God." Acts xxxvi. 7. And St. James addresses his epistle "to the twelve tribes which are scattered abroad." James i. 1. And there is no doubt but there are many of the descendants of the ten tribes of Israel still in being, though they cannot be separated from the rest. They are all confounded with the other Jews, and there is no difference between them. The Samaritans, indeed, (of whom there are still some remains at Shechem, and the neighbouring towns,) pretend to be the descendants of the children of Israel; but they are really derived from those nations which Esarhaddon, king of Assyria, planted in the country, after he had carried thence the ten tribes into captivity. And it is for this reason that the Jews call them by no other name than Cuthites, which was the name of the principal person of those nations. They exclaim against them as the worst of heretics, and, if possible, have a greater aversion to them than to the Christians.

It may, perhaps, be asked by some, what could be the reason that such a material difference and distinction should be made between the two tribes of Judah and Benjamin, and the ten tribes of Israel. Why the latter should be, as it were, lost in their captivity, and the former restored, and preserved several ages after. To this it is answered, that the ten tribes had totally revolted from God to the worship of the golden calves in Dan and Bethel; and for this, and their idolatry and wickedness, they were suffered to remain in the land of their captivity. The Jews were restored, not so much for their own sakes, as for the sake of the promises made unto their forefathers, namely, the promise to Judah, that the Messiah should come of his tribe; and the promise to David, that the Messiah should be born of his family. It was therefore necessary for the tribe of Judah, and the families of that tribe, to be kept distinct until the Divine dispensation should be accomplished. But since these ends have been fully answered, the tribes of Judah and Benjamin are are as much confounded as any of the rest: all distinction of families and genealogies is lost among them; and (as bishop Chandler observes) the Jews themselves acknowledge as much, in saying, that, when the Messiah shall come, it will be part of his office "to sort their families, restore their genealogies, and set aside strangers."

How astonishingly must it engage the attention of the most serious, when they reflect on the preservation of the Jews through so many ages, notwithstanding the great efforts that have been made, at different periods, totally to extirpate them, and that, instead of themselves, all their enemies have been finally reduced. But, wonderful as these events may appear, they are still made much more so by their being signified beforehand by the spirit of prophecy, as we find particularly in the prophet Jeremiah: "Fear not thou, O Jacob my servant, saith the Lord, for I am with thee, for I will make a full end of all the nations whither I have driven thee, but I will not make a full end of thee." Jer. xlv. 28.

Present state
of the Jews.

There is not certainly, either in ancient or modern history, any circumstance to be found so remarkably singular as that of the preservation of the Jews to the present period of time. They have been dispersed among all nations, and yet they are not confounded with any. They still live as a distinct people, and yet they do not live any where according to their own laws: they neither elect their own magistrates, or enjoy the full exercise of their religion. Their solemn feasts and sacrifices are limited to one certain place, and that hath been now, for many ages, in the hands of strangers and aliens, who will not suffer them to come thither. No people on the whole face of the earth have continued unmixed so long as they have. The northern nations have come in great multitudes into the more southern parts of Europe; but where are they now to be discerned and distinguished? The Gauls went forth in great bodies to seek their fortunes in foreign parts; but what traces or footsteps of them are now remaining any where? In France, who can separate the race of the ancient Gauls from the various other people, who, from time to time, have settled there? In Spain, who can distinguish exactly between the first possessors the Spaniards, and the Goths and Moors, who conquered and kept possession of the country for some time? In England, who can pretend to say, with certainty, which families are derived from the ancient Britons, and which from the Romans, or Saxons, or Danes, or Normans? The most ancient and honourable pedigrees can be traced up only to a certain period, and beyond that there is nothing but conjecture and uncertainty, obscurity and ignorance. But the Jews can go up higher than any nation; they can even deduce their pedigree from the beginning of the world. They may not know from what particular tribe or family they are descended, but they know certainly that they all sprung from the stock of Abraham. And yet the contempt with which they have been treated, and the hardships which they have undergone in almost all countries, should, one would think, have made them desirous to forget or renounce their original; but they profess it, they glory in it: and after so many wars, massacres, and persecutions, they still subsist, they still are very numerous: and what but a supernatural power could have preserved them in such a manner as no other nation upon earth hath been preserved?

of the Jews.

While we behold, with astonishment, the wise dispensations of Providence, in having protected the Jews even to the present period, we cannot, without equal astonishment, reflect on the circumstance of his having been pleased likewise utterly to destroy their enemies. The first oppressors of the Jews were the Egyptians, who detained them from their own land, compelled them into captivity, treated them with great cruelty, and kept them for many years in bondage. The Assyrians carried away captives the ten tribes of Israel, and the Babylonians afterwards the two remaining tribes of Judah and Benjamin. The Syro-Macedonians, especially Antiochus Epi-phanes, cruelly persecuted them: and the Romans utterly dissolved the Jewish state, and dispersed the people so that they have never been able to recover their city and country from that time to the present.

And where are now these great and famous monarchies, which, in their time, subdued and oppressed the people of God? are they not vanished, and not only their power, but almost even their very names, lost on the earth? The Egyptians, Assyrians, and Babylonians, were overthrown, and entirely subjugated by the Persians: and the Persians (it is remarkable) were the restorers of the Jews, as well as the destroyers of their enemies. The Syro-Macedonians were swallowed up by the Romans: and the Roman empire, great and powerful as it was, was broken into pieces by the repeated incursions of the northern nations; while the Jews are subsisting as a distinct people to this day. And how wonderful is it to think, that the vanquished should so many ages survive the victors, and the former be spread all over the world, while the latter are no more!

The Divine vengeance hath not only punished nations for their cruelties to the Jews, but hath likewise pursued even single persons who have been their persecutors and oppressors. The first-born of Pharaoh was destroyed, and himself, with his host, drowned in the Red Sea. Most of those who oppressed Israel in the days of the Judges came to an untimely end. Nebuchadnezzar was stricken with madness, and the crown was soon transferred from his family to strangers. Antiochus Epiphanes died in great agonies, with ulcers and vermin issuing from his body, so that the filthiness of him not only became intolerable to his attendants, but even to himself. Herod, who was a cruel tyrant to the Jews, died in the like miserable manner. Flaccus, governor of Egypt, who barbarously plundered and oppressed the Jews of Alexandria, was afterwards banished and slain. And Caligula, who persecuted the Jews, for refusing to pay Divine honour to his statue, was murdered in the flower of his age, after a short and wicked reign.

Ever since the Jews have absolutely rejected the gospel, and been no longer the people of God, there have not been any visible manifestations of Divine interposition in their favour. As a punishment for their infidelity, they have, for ages past, been dispersed all over the world, without having either temporal or spiritual protector. They are despised in all parts where they inhabit, and are the general scoff and ridicule of the people of all kingdoms.

Another most distinguished and memorable instance of the truth of prophecy is, the desolation of Judea. This prophecy was delivered so long ago as the time of Moses: "I will scatter you among the heathen, and will draw out a sword after you; and your land shall be desolate, and your cities waste." Levit. xxvi. 33. It was likewise foretold by the prophet Isaiah, who (speaking as prophets frequently did, of things future as present) says, "Your country is desolate, your cities are burnt with fire; your land, strangers devour it in your presence, and it is desolate as overthrown by strangers. And the daughter of Zion is left as a cottage in a vineyard, as a lodge in a garden of cucumbers, as a besieged city." Isaiah, chap. i. 7, 8, 9. This last passage may immediately relate to the times of Ahaz and Hezekiah; but it must have a farther reference to the devastations made by the Chaldeans, and especially by the Romans. In this sense it is understood by most ancient interpreters; and the following words imply no less than a general destruction, and almost total extinction of the people, such as they suffered under the Chaldeans, but more fully under the Romans: "Except the Lord of Hosts had left unto us a very small remnant, we should have been as Sodom, and we should have been like unto Gomorrah."

In other places the same thing is either expressed or implied: and hath not the state of Judea now for many ages been exactly answerable to this description? That a country should be depopulated and and desolated by the incursions and depredations of foreign armies is nothing wonderful, but that it should lie so many ages in this miserable condition is more than man can foresee, and could be revealed only by the Divine will.

The long wretched state of the land of Judea, in being forsaken by its original inhabitants, and left desolate and uncultivated, has occasioned some controversy. It has been said, to barren a country could never have been "a land flowing with milk and honey," nor have supplied and maintained such multitudes as it is represented to have done. But those who make this observation, do not see or consider, that hereby the prophecies are fulfilled.

The land of Judea, &c.

From the concurrent testimonies of those who best knew it (namely, the people who inhabited it) the land of Judea was formerly a good and fertile country. Both Aristotle and Josephus speak largely in commendation of its fruitfulness; and though something may be allowed to national prejudices, yet they would hardly have had the confidence to assert a thing which all the world could easily contradict and disprove. Nay, there are even heathen authors who bear testimony to the fruitfulness of the land; though we presume that, after the Babylonish captivity, it never recovered to be again what it was before. Strabo, indeed, describes the country about Jerusalem as rocky and barren, but he commends other parts, particularly about Jordan and Jericho. Herodotus gives it the character of one of the best and most fertile countries. And Tacitus saith, "it raineth seldom; the soil is fruitful; fruits abound as with us; and, besides them, the balsam and palm trees." And, notwithstanding the long desolation of the land, there are still visible such marks and tokens of fruitfulness, as may convince any one that it once deserved the character which is given it in the sacred writings.

Description of the land of Judea, by Mr. Maundrell.

To satisfy those who may be doubtful of the truth of this assertion, we shall take notice of the observations made by Mr. Maundrell and Dr. Shaw, two ingenious travellers of our own nation. The first of these says, "All along this day's travel, from Kane Leban to Beer, and also as far as we could see round, the country discovered a quite different face from what it had before; presenting nothing to the view, in most places, but naked rocks, mountains, and precipices. At sight of this pilgrims are apt to be much astonished and baulked in their expectations, finding that country in such an inhospitable condition, concerning whose pleasantness and plenty they had before formed, in their minds, such high ideas, from the description given of it in the word of God; in so much that it almost startles their faith, when they reflect how it could be possible for a land like this to supply food for so prodigious a number of inhabitants as are said to have been polled in the twelve tribes at one time; the number given in by Joab (2 Sam. xxiv.) amounting to no less than thirteen hundred thousand fighting men, besides women and children. But it is certain that any man, who is not biased to infidelity, may see, as he passes along, arguments enough to support his faith against such scruples. For it is obvious for any one to observe, that these rocks and hills must have been anciently covered with earth, and cultivated, and made to contribute to the maintenance of the inhabitants, no less than if the country had been all plain: nay, perhaps as much more; forasmuch as such a mountainous and uneven surface affords a larger space of ground for cultivation, than this country would amount to if it were all reduced to a perfect level. For the husbanding of these mountains, their manner was to gather up the stones, and place them in several lines along the sides of the hills, in form of a wall. By such borders they supported the mould from tumbling or being washed down; and formed many beds of excellent soil, rising gradually one above another, from the bottom to the top of the mountains. Of this form of culture you see evident footsteps wherever you go on all the mountains in Palestine. Thus the

"very rocks were made fruitful. And perhaps there is no spot of ground in this whole land that was not formerly improved, to the production of something or other, ministering to the sustenance of human life. For nothing can be more fruitful than the plain countries, whether for the production of corn or cattle, and consequently of milk. The hills, though improper for all cattle, except goats, being disposed into such beds as are before described, served very well to bear corn, melons, gourds, cucumbers, and such like garden stuff, which makes the principal food of these countries for several months in the year. The most rocky parts of all, which could not well be adjusted in that manner for the production of corn, might yet serve for the plantation of vines and olive trees; which delight to extract the one its fatness, the other its sprightly juice, chiefly out of such dry and stony places. And the great plain joining to the Dead Sea, which, by reason of its saltiness, might be thought unserviceable both for cattle, corn, olives, and vines, had yet its proper usefulness for the nourishment of bees, and for the fabric of honey; of which Josephus gives us his testimony. De Bell. Jud. Lib. 5. cap. 4. And I have reason to believe it, because, when I was there, I perceived, in many places, a smell of honey and wax, as strong as if one had been in an apiary. Why then might not this country very well maintain the vast number of its inhabitants, being in every part so productive of either milk, corn, wine, oil, or honey, which are the principal food of these eastern nations? The constitution of their bodies, and the nature of their climate, inclining them to a more abstemious diet than we use in England, and other colder regions."

In the description which Dr. Shaw gives, he asserts, that "were the Holy Land as well peopled and cultivated as in former times, it would be still more fruitful than the very best part of the coast of Syria and Phœnice; for the soil itself (says he) is generally much richer, and, all things considered, yields a more preferable crop. Thus the cotton that is gathered in the plains of Ramah, Ephraïm, and Zabulon, is in more esteem than what is cultivated near Sidon and Tripoly. Neither is it possible for pulse, wheat, or any sort of grain, to be more excellent than what is commonly sold in Jerusalem. The barrenness, or rather scarcity, which some authors may either ignorantly or maliciously complain of, does not proceed from the natural unfruitfulness of the country, but from want of inhabitants, and the great aversion there is to labour and industry in those few who possess it. There are, besides, such perpetual discords and depredations among the governors who share this fine country, that, allowing it was better peopled, there would be small encouragement to sow, when it was uncertain who should gather in the harvest. Otherwise the land is still capable of affording its neighbours the like supplies of corn and oil, which it is known to have done in the time of Solomon. The parts particularly about Jerusalem, being described to be rocky and mountainous, have been therefore supposed to be barren and unfruitful. Yet, granting this conclusion, which is far from being just, a kingdom is not to be denominated barren or unfruitful from one part of it only, but from the whole. Nay, farther, the blessing that was given to Judah was not of the same kind with the blessing of Asher or of Issachar, that 'his bread should be fat,' or 'his land should be pleasant,' but that 'his eyes should be red with wine, and his teeth should be white with milk.' Gen. xlv. 12. Moses also maketh mention of the earlier ages, as they continue to be of the Bedoween Arabs) to be 'the glory of all lands:' all which productions are either actually enjoyed, or at least might be, by proper care and application. The plenty of wine alone is wanting at present; yet, from the goodness of that little which is still made at Jerusalem and Hebron, we find

Dr. Shaw's description of Judea.

"find that these barren rocks (as they are called) might yield a much greater quantity, if the ambitious Turk and Arab would permit a further increase and improvement to be made of the vine, &c."

Infidelity of the Jews.

The prophets Jeremiah, Isaiah, and others, not only foretold the desolation of the country of the Jews, and their dispersion through all parts of the world, but likewise their infidelity in disbelieving the Messiah, and what would be the consequences that would result therefrom. Of this there are numerous instances; but it will be sufficient to produce one or two passages from the prophet Isaiah. "Who hath believed our report? and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?" Isaiah liii. 1. These words both St. John and St. Paul have expressly applied to the unbelieving Jews of their time. The prophet likewise assigns the reason why they would not receive the Messiah, namely, because of his low and afflicted condition: and it is certain they rejected him on this account, having all along expected him to come as a temporal prince and deliverer in great power and glory.

Isaiah is commissioned to declare the Divine judgments to the people for their infidelity and disobedience.

The prophet Isaiah was commissioned to declare unto the people the judgments of God for their infidelity and disobedience. And he said, "Go ye and tell this people, Hear ye indeed, but understand not; and see ye indeed, but perceive not. Make the hearts of this people fat, and make their ears heavy, and shut their eyes; lest they see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and convert, and be healed." Isaiah vi. 9, &c.

The prophets, in the style of scripture, are said "to do" what they declare "will be done:" and in like manner Jeremiah is said to be "set over the nations, and over the kingdoms, to root out, and to pull down, and to destroy, and to throw down, to build, and to plant;" Jer. i. 10. because he was authorized to make known the purposes and decrees of God, and because these events would follow in consequence of his prophecies. "Make the hearts of this people fat," is therefore as much as to say, "Denounce my judgments upon this people, that their hearts shall be fat, and their ears heavy, and their eyes shut; lest they see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and convert, and be healed." This prophecy might relate, in some measure, to the state of the Jews before the Babylonish captivity; but it did not receive its full completion till the days of Our Saviour: and in this sense it is understood and applied by the writers of the New Testament, and by Our Saviour himself.

The infidelity and obstinacy of the Jews to be of long duration.

Jeremiah is then informed, that this infidelity and obstinacy of his countrymen should be of long duration. "Then said I, Lord, how long? And he answered, Until the cities be wasted without inhabitant, and the houses without man, and the land be utterly desolate; and the Lord have removed men far away, and there be a great forsaking in the midst of the land." What a remarkable gradation is here in the denouncing of these judgments! Not only Jerusalem and "the cities should be wasted without inhabitants," but even the single "houses" should be "without man;" and not only the "houses" of the cities should be "without man," but even the country should be "utterly desolate;" and not only the people should be removed out of the "land," but "the Lord" should "remove them far away;" and they should not be removed for a short period, but there should be "a great" or rather "a long forsaking in the midst of the land."

And have not we seen all these particulars exactly fulfilled? Have not the Jews laboured under a spiritual blindness and insatiation in "hearing but not understanding," in "seeing but not perceiving," the Messiah, after the accomplishment of so many prophecies, and after the performance of so many miracles? And in consequence of their refusing to "convert and be healed," have not "their cities been wasted without inhabitant, and their "houses without man?" Hath not their "land been utterly desolate?" Have they not been "removed far away," even into the most distant parts of the earth? And hath not their removal or banishment been now upwards of 1700 years duration? Do they not still continue deaf and blind, unbelieving and obdurate?

When this prophecy was delivered, the Jews gloried in being the peculiar people of God; and would any Jew of himself have either thought, or said, that his nation would, in process of time, become an infidel and reprobate for many ages, oppressed by man, and forsaken by God? It was more than 750 years before Christ that the prophet Isaiah predicted these things; and how could he have so done, unless he had been illuminated by the Divine vision? or how could they have succeeded accordingly, unless the spirit of prophecy had been the Spirit of God?

Of the like nature are the prophecies concerning the calling and obedience of the Gentiles. How could such an event be foreseen hundreds of years before it happened? But the prophets are full of the glorious subject, and speak with delight and rapture of the universal kingdom of the Messiah: that "God would give unto him the heathen for his inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for his possession." Psalm ii. 8. That "all the ends of the world should remember and turn unto the Lord, and all the kindreds of the nations should worship before him." Psalm xxii. 27. That in the last days the mountain of the house of the Lord should be established on the top of the mountain, and should be exalted above the hills, and all people should flow unto it." Micah iv. 1. (which passage is also to be found in Isaiah ii. 2.) That "from the rising of the sun even unto the going down of the same, my name shall be great among the Gentiles, and in every place incense shall be offered unto my name, and a pure offering; for my name shall be great among the heathen, saith the Lord of hosts." Malachi i. 11.

But the prophet Isaiah is more copious upon this as well as other evangelical subjects; and his 49th and 60th chapters treat particularly of the glory of the church in the abundant access of the Gentiles. "It is a light thing that thou shouldest be my servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob, and to restore the preserved of Israel: I will also give thee for a light to the Gentiles, that thou mayest be my salvation unto the end of the earth." Isaiah xlix. 6. And again, "Arise, shine, for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee. The Gentiles shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising. The abundance of the sea shall be converted unto thee, the forces of the Gentiles shall come unto thee, &c." Isaiah lx. 1, 3, 5, &c.

The Jews have applied these prophecies to the proselytes whom they have gained in the different nations into which they have been dispersed; but this is no less absurd than vain. The number of their proselytes was very inconsiderable, and nothing to answer these pompous descriptions. Neither was their religion ever designed, by its founder, for an universal religion, their worship and sacrifices being confined to one certain place, whither all the males were obliged to repair thrice every year; so that it was plainly calculated for a particular people, and could never become the religion of the whole world. There was, indeed, to be a religion, which was to be designed for all nations, to be preached in all, and to be received in all: but what prospect or probability was there that such a generous institution should proceed from such a narrow-minded people as the Jews, or that the Gentiles should ever receive a religion from the very people whom they most hated and despised? Was it not much more likely that the Jews would be corrupted by the idolatrous nations around them, and be induced to comply with the maxims of their powerful neighbours, than that they should be the happy instruments of reforming the world, and converting some of all nations to the worship of the true God?

The

The prophet farther intimates, that this revolution (the greatest that ever happened in the religious world) should be effected by a few people, of low rank and education. "A little one shall become a thousand, and a small one a strong nation." Isaiah lx. 22.

The commission given by Our Blessed Saviour to his apostles, was, "Go, teach all nations." And who were the persons to whom this commission was given? Was it to those who might have been thought best qualified to carry it into execution, such as the rich, the wise, the mighty of this world? No: they were chiefly a few poor fishermen, of low parentage and education, of no learning or eloquence, of no policy or address, of no worldly repute or authority, despised as Jews by the rest of mankind, and as the meanest and worst of Jews by the Jews themselves. These were the persons (strange and wonderful as it may appear) who were to contend with the prejudices of all the world, the superstitions of the people, the interests of the priests, the vanity of the philosophers, the pride of rulers, the malice of Jews, the learning of Greece, and the power of the Roman empire.

This great revolution was not only to be brought about by a few persons of mean birth, but it was likewise to be effected in a very short space of time. "I the Lord will hasten it in his time." Isaiah lx. 22.

After the ascension of Our Saviour, the number of the disciples together was about "an hundred and twenty;" Acts i. 15. but they soon increased and multiplied. The first sermon preached by St. Peter added unto them "about three thousand souls;" Acts ii. 41. and the second made up the number "about five thousand." Acts iv. 4.

Previous to the final destruction of Jerusalem (for about the space of forty years) the gospel had been so spread, that it was preached in almost every region of the then known world. In the reign of Constantine the Great, Christianity became the religion of the empire; and, after having suffered a little under Julian, it entirely prevailed, and triumphed over paganism and idolatry; and still does prevail in the most civilized and improved parts of the earth. All this was more than man could foresee, and much more than man could execute; and to this day we experience the good effects of these prophecies.

The speedy propagation of the gospel could not have been effected by persons so unequal to the task, if the same Divine Spirit, who foretold it, had not likewise assisted them in it, according to the promise, "I the Lord will hasten it in his time." In short, we may be as certain as if we had beheld it with our own eyes, that the matter really was as represented by the Evangelist; "They went forth and preached every where, the Lord working with them, and confirming the word with signs following." Mark xvi. 20.

But neither the prophecies concerning the Gentiles, nor those concerning the Jews, have yet received their full and entire completion. Our Saviour hath not yet had "the uttermost parts of the earth for his possession;" Psalm ii. 8. "All the ends of the earth have not yet turned unto the Lord," xxii. 27. "All people, nations, and languages," have not yet "served him;" Dan. vii. 14. These things have hitherto been only partially, but they will, in time, be even literally fulfilled. Neither are the Jews yet made "an eternal excellency, a joy of many generations." Isaiah lx. 15. The time is not yet come, when "violence shall no more be heard in the land, wasting nor destruction within their borders;" ver. 18. God's promises to them are not yet fulfilled to the extent. "Behold, I will take the children of Israel from among the heathen, whither they be gone, and will gather them on every side, and bring them into their own land. And they shall dwell in the land that I have given unto Jacob my servant, even they and their children, and their childrens children for ever, and my servant David shall be their prince for ever." Ezek. xxxvii. 21. 25. "Then shall they know that I am the Lord their God, who caused them to be led into captivity among the heathen; but I have gathered them unto their own land, and have left none of them any more there. Neither will I hide my face any more from them, for I have poured out my spirit upon the house of Israel, saith the Lord God." Ezek. xxxix. 28, 29.

However, what hath already been accomplished, is a sufficient pledge and earnest of what is yet to come: and we have all imaginable reason to believe, since so many of these prophecies have been fulfilled, that the remaining ones will be fulfilled also; that there will be yet a greater harvest of the nations, and the yet unconverted parts of the earth will be enlightened with the knowledge of the Lord; and that the Jews will, in God's good time, be converted to Christianity, and, upon their conversion, be again restored to their native country.

The prophet Hosea says, "The children of Israel shall abide many days without a king, and without a prince, and without a sacrifice, and without an image, (or altar,) and without an ephod, (or priest to wear an ephod,) or without teraphim, (or Divine manifestations.) Afterward shall the children of Israel return, and seek the Lord their God, and shall fear the Lord and his goodness in the latter days." Hosea iii. 4, 5.

The Jews were once the peculiar people of God: and (as St. Paul saith) "Hath God cast away his people? God forbid." Rom. xi. 1. We see that, after so many ages, they are still preserved, by a miraculous Providence, a distinct people; and why is such a continued miracle exerted but for the greater illustration of the Divine truth, and the better accomplishment of the Divine promises, as well those which are yet to be, as those which are already fulfilled?

The great empires and powers which have heretofore, in their turns, subdued and oppressed the people of God, are all come to ruin: because though they executed the Divine purposes in oppressing the Jews, yet that was more than they knew; and their intentions, in acting as they did, were only to gratify their own pride and ambition, their own cruelty and revenge. And since such hath been the fatal end of the enemies and oppressors of the Jews, in former times, it should serve as a warning to all those who may, at any time, or upon any occasion, hereafter, be inclined to raise a clamour and persecution against them.

It must be allowed that the Jews are exceeding blameable for still persisting in their infidelity, after so many means have been taken to bring them to a sense of conviction; but this does not authorize us to proscribe, abuse, injure, and oppress them, as Christians, of more zeal than either knowledge or charity, have, in all ages, been inclined to do. "Charity is greater than faith;" and it is worse in us to be cruel and uncharitable, than it is in them to be obstinate and unbelieving.

It may be observed by some, that shewing compassion to these unhappy people would be a means of defeating the fulfilment of the prophecies. But this is far from being the case; they were to be harassed and oppressed only by wicked nations; the good were to shew mercy on them; and we should chafe rather to be the dispensers of God's mercies than the executioners of his judgments.

If we read the eleventh chapter of St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, we shall there see with that great apostle of the Gentiles (who certainly understood the prophecies better than any of us can pretend to do) faith of the infidelity of the Jews. Some of the Gentiles of his time valued themselves upon their superior advantages, and he reproves them for it, that they, who "were cut out of the olive-tree, which is wild by nature, and were grafted, contrary to nature, into a good olive-tree," should presume to "boast against the natural branches." Rom.

Prophecy of Hosea.

The Jews not to be injured or oppressed.

Number of Disciples after Ascension.

The prophecies yet to be fully completed.

Rom. xi. 18, 24. But what would he have said, if they had made religion an instrument of faction, and had been for stirring up a persecution against them?

Christians of all denominations should consider and reflect, that it is to the Jews we owe the oracles of God, and the scriptures of the New Testament as well as the Old. We should consider that "the glorious company of the apostles," as well as the "goodly fellowship of the prophets," were all Jews. We should consider that "of them" as concerning the flesh Christ came, the Saviour of the world; and surely something of kindness and gratitude is due for such infinite obligations.

Though the Jews are now broken off, yet they are not utterly cast away. "Because of unbelief," as St. Paul argueth, they "were broken off, and" thou "standest by faith; be not high-minded, but fear." Rom. xi. 20. There will be a time when they will be grafted in again, and again become the people of God: for, as the apostle proceeds, "I would not brethren that ye should be ignorant of this my story lest you should be wise in your own conceits; that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in, and so all Israel shall be saved." Rom. xi. 25, 26.

And which now, it may be asked, is the most likely method to contribute to the conversion of these unhappy people? which are the most natural means of reconciling them to us and our religion? Is it to be effected by prayer, argument, long-suffering, gentleness and goodness; or by noise, invective, injury, and outrage; the malice of some, and the folly and madness of more? They certainly cannot be worse now than when they crucified the Son of God, and persecuted his apostles. But what saith Our Blessed Saviour himself? "Father forgive them, for they know not what they do." Luke xxiii. 34. And what saith his apostle St. Paul? "Brethren, my heart's desire and prayer to God for Israel is, that they might be saved." Rom. x. 1.

In conformity to these blessed examples, our church hath also taught us to pray for them: and how can prayer and persecution consist and agree together? Those who encourage persecution of any kind, are not only pretended friends to the church, but real enemies to religion. All true members of the church, all true Protestants, all true Christians, will, as the apostle adviseth, "put away all bitterness and wrath, and anger, and clamour, and evil speaking, with all malice." Ephes. iv. 31. And they will all join heart and voice in that excellent collect, "Have mercy upon all Jews, Turks, Infidels, and Heretics, and take from them all ignorance, hardness of heart, and contempt of thy word: and so fetch them home, blessed Lord, to thy flock, that they may be saved among the remnant of the true Israelites, and be made one fold under one shepherd, Jesus Christ our Lord."

CHAP. VII.

Prophecies concerning the ancient city of Nineveh.

The Jews not utterly cast away. The fate of other nations foretold as well as that of the Jews.

THE first great prophecies contained in the Old Testament are those which more immediately relate to the Jews themselves, who were once the peculiar people of God; and the principal subjects of those prophecies are the various changes and revolutions that were to happen in the Jewish church and state. But the spirit of prophecy is not confined to the Jews alone; there are other subjects occasionally introduced; and for the greater manifestation of Divine Providence, the fate of other nations is also foretold, and more especially those which lay in the neighbourhood of Judea, and had intercourse and connection with the Jews.

It is much to be lamented, that, of these eastern nations, and of these early times, we have no regular histories, but only a few fragments which have escaped the general shipwreck of time. From these, however, we see enough to make us admire the great works of Providence; and from these are clearly shown, that the revolutions of cities and kingdoms hath been such as was long ago foretold by the prophets.

The first prophecies we shall notice on this subject are those relative to the ancient city of Nineveh, once the metropolis of the Assyrian empire, and whose inhabitants not only destroyed the kingdom of Israel, but likewise greatly oppressed the kingdom of Judah.

The prophet Isaiah, in denouncing the judgments of God against the Assyrians, says, "O Assyrian, the rod of mine anger, and the staff in their hand is my indignation." Isaiah x. 3. It was the will of Providence that those people should be employed as the ministers of his wrath, and executioners of his vengeance, against the perverse and obdurate Jews. "I will send him against an hypocritical nation; and against the people of my wrath will I give him a charge to take the spoil, and to take the prey, and to tread them down like the mire in the streets." Isaiah x. 6. But it was far from any intent of the Assyrians to execute the Divine will, or to chastise the vices of mankind; they only meant to extend their conquests, and establish their own dominion upon the ruins of others: "Howbeit he meaneth not so, neither doth his heart think so, but it is in his heart to destroy, and cut off nations not a few:" ver. 7. Wherefore, when they shall have served the purposes of Divine Providence, they shall be severely punished for their pride and ambition, their tyranny and cruelty to their neighbours: "Wherefore it shall come to pass, that when the Lord hath performed his whole work upon mount Zion, and on Jerusalem, I will punish the fruit of the stout heart of the king of Assyria, and the glory of his high looks:" ver. 12.

There was no prospect of such an event as this while the Assyrians were in the midst of their successes and triumphs; but still the word of the prophet prevailed; and it was not long after the calamities they brought upon the Jews, the Assyrian empire (properly so called) was overthrown, and Nineveh destroyed.

The city of Nineveh was one of the largest and most ancient cities in the world. According to the best chronologers it was built not long after the flood, and very soon after the tower of Babel, by Nimrod; but being afterwards greatly enlarged by Ninus, from him it received its name. It was situated on the banks of the Tigris, and (according to the description given of it by Diodorus Siculus) was, in length, an hundred and fifty stadia; in breadth fourscore and ten; and in circumference, four hundred and seventy; which, being reduced to our measure, make it about twenty-one miles long, nine broad, and fifty-four round. How great the number of its inhabitants was, we may learn from "the six score thousand children who could not discern between their right hands and their left." Jonah iv. 11. And, according to a proportionate computation, there must have been, in the whole, not less than six hundred thousand persons.

The inhabitants of Nineveh, like those of other great cities, abounding in wealth and luxury, became very corrupt in their morals. In consequence of this, God was pleased to commission the prophet Jonah to preach unto them the necessity of repentance, as the only means of averting their impending destruction: and such was the success of his preaching, that both the king and people repented, and turned from their evil ways, and thereby, for a time, escaped the executions of the Divine judgments.

But this repentance of the Ninevites, we may reasonably presume, was of no long continuance; for not many years after, we find the prophet Nahum foretelling the total and entire destruction of the city. Indeed, the whole of this prophecy relates to this single event; and the city was accordingly destroyed.

stroyed by the Medes and Babylonians, who, uniting together, subverted the whole Assyrian empire.

It is remarkable that the prophet Nahum not only foretold the destruction of Nineveh, but likewise the manner in which it was to be effected. He foretold that the Assyrians would be taken while they were drunken. "For while they be tolden together as thorns, and while they are drunken as drunkards, they shall be devoured as stubble full dry." Nahum i. 10. And Diodorus Siculus says, "It was while the Assyrian army were feasting for their former victories, that those about Arbaces, (the general of the Median forces,) being informed, by some deserters, of the negligence and drunkenness in the camp of the enemy, assaulted them unexpectedly by night, and falling on them while they were in the utmost disorder, and unprepared, became masters of the camp, slew many of the soldiers, and drove the rest into the city."

The prophet Nahum likewise foretells, that "the gates of the rivers shall be opened, and the palace shall be dissolved." Nahum ii. 6. And Diodorus tells us, "there was an old prophecy, that Nineveh should not be taken till the river became an enemy to the city; and in the third year of the siege, the river, being swollen with continual rains, overflowed part of the city, and broke down the wall for twenty furlongs: that the king, thinking the oracle was fulfilled, and the river become an enemy to the city, built a large funeral pile in the palace, and collecting together all his wealth, and his concubines and eunuchs, burnt himself and them in the palace; and the enemy entered the breach that the waters had made, and took the city."

Thus we find that what the prophet had predicted was literally fulfilled. "With an overflowing flood he will make an utter end of the place thereof." Nahum i. 8. He likewise promises the enemy much spoil of gold and silver. "Take ye the spoil of silver, take the spoil of gold; for there is no end to the store, and glory out of all the pleasant furniture." Nahum ii. 9. And we read in Diodorus Siculus, that Arbaces carried many talents of gold and silver to Ecbatane, the royal city belonging to the Medes.

According to the prophecy of Nahum, the city was to be destroyed partly by water, and partly by fire. "Behold, the gates of thy land shall be set wide open unto thine enemies: the fire shall devour thy bars." Nahum iii. 13. And we find, by Diodorus, that this literally took place; for, after the Medes and Babylonians had possessed themselves of the city, they set fire to it, and reduced the greater part of it to ashes.

The prophet Nahum was the principal person who foretold the total and entire destruction of the ancient city of Nineveh. "The Lord (saith he) with an over-running flood will make an utter end of the place thereof; he will make an utter end; affliction shall not rise up the second time." Chap. i. 8, 9. Again, "Where is the dwelling of the lions?" (meaning Nineveh, whose princes ravaged like lions:) "Behold, I am against thee, saith the Lord of hosts, and I will cut off thy prey from the earth, and the voice of thy messengers shall no more be heard." Chap. ii. 11, 13. And again, "Thy crowned are as the locusts, and thy captains as the grasshoppers, which camp in the hedges in the cold day; but when the sun ariseth, they flee away, and their place is not known. Thy shepherds slumber, O king of Assyria; thy nobles shall dwell in the dust; thy people is scattered upon the mountains, and no man gathereth them: there is no healing of thy bruise; thy wound is grievous; all that hear the bruit of thee shall clap their hands over thee; for upon whom hath not thy wickedness passed continually?" Chap. iii. 17, 18, 19.

The prophet Zedekiah likewise, in the days of Josiah, king of Judah, foretold the same melancholy event. "The Lord will stretch out his hand against No. 54.

"the north, and destroy Assyria, and will make Nineveh a desolation, and dry like a wilderness: and flocks shall lie down in the midst of her, all the beasts of the nations; both the cormorant and bittern shall lodge in the upper lintels of it; their voice shall sing in the windows; desolation shall be in the thresholds; for he shall uncover the cedar work: this is the rejoicing city that dwelt carelessly, that said in her heart, I am, and there is none beside me; how is she become a desolation, a place for beasts to lie down in! every one that passeth by her shall hiss and wag his hand." Zeph. ii. 13, &c.

It is not to be wondered at that, when those prophecies were at first delivered, the people should think it very unlikely they would ever be fulfilled. What probability, indeed, was there to think that so great a city, and which contained so many thousand inhabitants, should ever be totally destroyed? And yet so totally was it destroyed, that even the place where it stood is now scarcely known.

It has been already observed, that Nineveh was taken and destroyed by the Medes and Babylonians; and what we may reasonably suppose contributed to complete its ruin and devastation was, Nebuchadnezzar's soon after enlarging and beautifying of Babylon. From that time no mention is made of Nineveh by any of the sacred writers; and the most ancient of the profane authors, who have occasion to say any thing about it, speak of it as a city that once was great and flourishing, but now destroyed and desolate.

The same accounts are given of it by all our modern travellers, and particularly by Thevenot, on whose authority Dean Prideaux relates, that "Mosul is situated on the west side of the river Tigris, where was anciently only a suburb of the Old Nineveh; for the city itself stood on the east side of the river, where are to be seen some of its rubbish, of great extent, even to this day."

Another modern traveller says, "In this country the famous city of Nineveh once stood, on the eastern bank of the river Tigris, opposite to the place where Mosul now stands. There is nothing now to be seen but heaps of rubbish, almost a league along the river Tigris, opposite to Mosul, which people imagine to be the remains of this vast city."

Such hath been the fate of the once great city of Nineveh; in the destruction of which is most amply manifested the great truths of the Divine predictions!

CHAP. VIII.

Prophecies concerning the city of Babylon.

THE city of Babylon, after the destruction of Nineveh, became not only the greatest and most magnificent metropolis in the east, but in the whole world. It is said, by some, to have been first built by Semiramis, queen of Assyria; while others assert that it was built by Balus, the successor of Nimrod. But whoever was the first founder, we may reasonably suppose it received very great improvements afterwards; and Nebuchadnezzar, in particular, enlarged and beautified it to such a degree, that he may in a manner (as himself boasts) be said to have built it. "Is not this (says he) great Babylon that I have built for the house of the kingdom, by the might of my power, and for the honour of my majesty?" Dan. iv. 30. By one means or other Babylon became so great and famous a city as to give name to a very large empire. It is called, in scripture, "great Babylon; the glory of kingdoms; the beauty of the Chaldees' excellency; the praise of the whole earth, &c." And its beauty, strength, grandeur, walls, temples, and palaces, are described with such pomp and magnificence by profane authors, that it must deservedly have been reputed one of the wonders of the world.

Prophecies concerning the city of Babylon.

It might naturally have been imagined that such a city as this was in no danger of ever being abandoned, much less of its coming to destruction. Such a city as this might surely, with less vanity than any other, boast that she should continue for ever; but, alas! great as it once was, the time did come when all its splendor was laid aside, and the whole became one continued scene of ruins.

The Babylonians enemies to the Jews.

The inhabitants of Babylon were no less enemies to the Jews than those of Nineveh. The one subverted the kingdom of Israel, and the other the kingdom of Judah. It is, therefore, not to be wondered at, that there should be several prophecies relative to these two cities, and that the fate of Babylon should be foretold as well as that of Nineveh. "Israel is a scattered sheep, the lions have driven him away: first the king of Assyria hath devoured him, and last this Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon hath broken his bones: Therefore thus saith the Lord of hosts the God of Israel, Behold, I will punish the king of Babylon and his land, as I have punished the king of Assyria." Lament. i. 17, 18.

The prophets Isaiah and Jeremiah foretell the destruction of Babylon.

The prophets Isaiah and Jeremiah very plainly, and in a particular manner, foretold the destruction of this great city. They both lived during the declension of the kingdom of Judah. As they predicted the captivity of the Jews, so they likewise foretold the downfall of their enemies: and they speak with such assurance of the event, that they describe a thing future as if it were already past. "Babylon is fallen, is fallen; and all the graven images of her gods he hath broken unto the ground." Isaiah xxi. 9. "Babylon is suddenly fallen and destroyed; howl for her, take balm for her pain, if so be she may be healed." Jeremiah li. 8.

Prophecies relative to Cyrus.

Cyrus, who was the conqueror of Babylon, and transferred the empire of the Babylonians to the Medes and Persians, was particularly foretold by name many years before he was born. Isaiah xlv. 28. xlv. 1. He is honoured with the appellation of the "Lord's anointed;" and the Lord is said to "have holden his right hand," and to have "girded him." He was certainly a person of very extraordinary abilities, and was raised up to be the instrument of Providence in executing great and wise purposes.

It was foretold that Cyrus should be a great conqueror; that he should "subdue nations before him: and I will loose the loins of kings to open before him the two-leaved gates, and the gates shall not be shut." Isaiah xlv. 1. This was strictly fulfilled; for Cyrus subdued several kings, and took several cities, particularly Sardes and Babylon, and extended his conquests all over Asia, from the river Indus to the Ægean Sea.

It was likewise foretold that Cyrus should find great spoil and treasure among the nations he should conquer. "I will give thee the treasures of darkness, and hidden riches of secret places." Isaiah xlv. 3. And the riches which Cyrus found in his conquests were of prodigious value, as appears from the accounts given us by Pliny. Nor can we wonder at it, when we consider that those parts of Asia, at that time, abounded in wealth and luxury. Babylon had been heaping up treasures many years: and the riches of Cræsus, king of Lydia, whom Cyrus conquered and took prisoner, are, in a manner, become proverbial.

The prophet Jeremiah not only foretells the destruction of the great city of Babylon, but likewise points out the time when it is to be effected. "These nations (says he, speaking of the Jews) shall serve the king of Babylon seventy years: And it shall come to pass when seventy years are accomplished, that I will punish the king of Babylon, and that nation saith the Lord." Jer. xxv. 11, 12. This prophecy was delivered, as appears from the first verse of the chapter, "in the fourth year of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah, that was the first year of Nebuchadnezzar

"king of Babylon;" from which time there were seventy years to the taking of Babylon, and the restoration of the Jews from captivity. Nebuchadnezzar, after taking Jerusalem, transplanted the Jews to Babylon, in order to strengthen the place: their removal from thence must, therefore, have greatly weakened it; after which it became more and more distressed, till at length it was finally destroyed.

It was foretold that various nations should unite against Babylon. "The noise of a multitude in the mountains, like as of a great people; a tumultuous noise of the kingdom of nations gathered together; the Lord of hosts mustereth the host of the battle." Isaiah xlii. 4. And particularly it was foretold, that the kingdoms of Ararat, Minni, and Ashchenaz, (that is, the Armenians, Phrygians, and other nations,) should compose part of his army. "Set ye up a standard in the land, blow the trumpet among the nations, prepare the nations against her, call together against her the kingdoms of Ararat, Minni, and, Ashchenaz." Jer. li. 27. And accordingly Cyrus's army consisted of various nations; and among them were those very people whom he had conquered before, and now obliged to attend him in this expedition.

It was foretold that the Babylonians should be terrified, and hide themselves within their walls. "The mighty men of Babylon have foreborn to fight, they have remained in their holds, their might hath failed, they became as women." Jer. li. 30. And accordingly we find that, after a battle or two, the Babylonians never recovered their courage to face the enemy in the field again. They retired within their wall; and the first time that Cyrus came with his army before the place, he could not provoke them to venture forth and try the fortune of arms, even though he sent a challenge to the king, to fight with him in single combat: and the last time that he went, he consulted with his officers about the best method of carrying on the siege, "since (saith he) they do not come forth and fight."

It was likewise foretold that the river should be dried up before the city should be taken. This appeared very extraordinary, indeed, the river being more than two furlongs broad, and deeper than the height of two men standing one upon another; so that the city was thought to be stronger and better fortified by the river than by the walls. But, notwithstanding this, the prophets predicted that the waters should be dried up. See Isaiah xlv. 27. Jer. l. 38. li. 36. And accordingly Cyrus turned the course of the river Euphrates, which ran through the midst of Babylon, and, by means of deep trenches and canals, so drained the waters, that the river became easily fordable for his soldiers to enter the city; and by those means Babylon (which was otherwise impregnable) was taken.

It was foretold that the city should be taken by surprise during the time of a feast. "I have laid a snare for thee, and thou art also taken, O Babylon, and thou wast not aware, thou art found and also caught." Jer. l. 24. "In their heat I will make their feasts, and I will make them drunken, that they may rejoice, and sleep a perpetual sleep, and not wake saith the Lord." Jer. li. 57. And accordingly the city was taken in the night of a great annual feast, while the inhabitants were dancing, drinking, and revelling, and not having the least suspicion that any immediate danger was at hand.

Such were the very extraordinary circumstances that attended the reduction of Babylon: and how could any man foresee or foretell such singular events, such remarkable circumstances, without revelation and inspiration from God?

If we examine still farther into these mysterious affairs, we shall see how these and other prophecies have, by degrees, been fulfilled; for, in the very nature of the thing, they could not be fulfilled all at once. As the prophets often speak of things to be in future, as if they were already effected, so they speak often of things to be brought about in process of time, as if they were to succeed immediately. The past, present, and to come, are all alike known to infinite wisdom; but it is probable that the intermediate time was not revealed to the minds of the prophets.

The prophet Isaiah addresseth Babylon by the name of a virgin, as having never before been taken by an enemy. "Come and sit down in the dust, O virgin daughter of Babylon, sit on the ground," Isaiah xlvii. 1. And Herodotus saith expressly, that this was the first time Babylon was taken. After this it never more recovered its ancient splendor: from an imperial it became a tributary city; from being governed by its own kings, and governing strangers, it became itself to be governed by strangers; and the seat of empire being transplanted to Shudhan, it decayed by degrees, till it was at length reduced to utter desolation.

We are told by Berofus, that, when Cyrus had taken Babylon, he ordered the outer walls to be pulled down, because the city appeared to him very difficult to be taken on that account. And Xenophon informs us, that Cyrus obliged the Babylonians to deliver up all their arms upon pain of death, distributed their bell houses among his officers, imposed a tribute upon them, appointed a strong garrison, and compelled the Babylonians to defray the charge, being desirous to keep them poor, as the best means of keeping them obedient.

But, notwithstanding these precautions, they rebelled against Darius; and, in order to hold out to the last extremity, they took all their women, and each man choosing one of them out of his own family whom he liked best, they strangled the rest, that unnecessary mouths might not consume their provisions. "And hereby (saith Dean Prideaux) was very signally fulfilled the prophecy of Isaiah against them, in which he foretold, 'That two things should come to them in a moment, in one day, the loss of children and widowhood, and that these shall come upon them in their perfection, for the multitude of their forceries, and the great abundance of their enchantments,' Isaiah xlvii. 9. And in what greater perfection could these calamities come upon them, than when they themselves thus upon themselves became the executioners of them?" They sustained the assault against all the efforts of Darius for twenty months; and at length the city was taken by stratagem. As soon as Darius had made himself master of the place, he ordered three thousand of the principal men to be crucified, and thereby fulfilled the prophecies of the cruelty which the Medes and Persians should use towards the Babylonians, Isaiah xlii. 17, 18. Jer. l. 42. He likewise demolished the wall, and burnt the gates; by which was remarkably fulfilled the prophecy of Jeremiah; "Thus saith the Lord of hosts, The broad walls of Babylon shall be utterly broken, and her high gates shall be burnt with fire," Jer. li. 58.

When Xerxes returned from his unfortunate expedition into Greece, partly out of religious zeal, (being a professed enemy to image worship,) and partly to reimburse himself after his immense expences, he seized upon the treasures, and plundered or destroyed the temples and idols in Babylon, thereby accomplishing the prophecies of Isaiah and Jeremiah: "Babylon is fallen, is fallen; and all the graven images of her gods he hath broken unto the ground: Bel boweth down, Nebo stoopeth," Isaiah xxi. 9. Jer. l. 44. "Babylon is taken, Bel is confounded, Merodach is broken in pieces. And I will punish Bel in Babylon, and I will bring forth out of his mouth that which he hath swallowed up," Jer. l. 2. li. 44, &c. This part of the prophecy was most literally fulfilled, when the vessels of the House of God, which Nebuchadnezzar had brought from Jerusalem, and placed in the temple of Bel, were restored by order of Cyrus, and carried back to Jerusalem.

After the destruction of Babylon by the Persians, Alexander intended to have made it the seat of his empire, and actually set men at work to rebuild the temple of Balus, to repair the banks of the river, and to bring back the waters into their own channel. But if his designs had taken effect, how could the prophecies have been fulfilled? And what a providence therefore it was, that his designs did not take effect, and that the breaches were never repaired? He met with some difficulties in the work; and death soon after put an end to this and all his other projects; and none of his successors ever attempted it. Seleucia being built a few years after in the neighbourhood, Babylon, in a little time, became wholly desolate, Seleucia not only robbing it of its inhabitants, but (according to Pliny) even of its name.

Babylon becomes wholly desolate.

That the prophecies relative to the fate of this ancient and once magnificent city, have, in the most strict manner, been fulfilled, appears from accounts given of it by a variety of authors, both ancient and modern. Among the former, Diodorus Siculus describes the buildings as ruined or decayed in his time, and says, that only a small part of the city was then inhabited, the greatest part within the walls being tiled. Strabo (who wrote not long after Diodorus) says, that one part of the city was demolished by the Persians, and the other by time and the neglect of the Macedonians, and especially after Seleucus Nicanor had built Seleucia on the Tigris, in the neighbourhood of Babylon, and he and his successors removed their court thither: and now (saith he) Seleucia is greater than Babylon, and Babylon is much deserted; so that one may apply to this what the poet said of Magalopolis, in Arcadia, "the great city is now become a great desert." Pliny, in like manner, affirms, that it was reduced to solitude, being exhausted by the neighbourhood of Seleucia, built for that purpose by Seleucus Nicanor. Maximus Tyrius mentions it as lying neglected and forsaken; and Lucian intimates, that in a little time it would be sought for, and not found. In the time of Jerome (who lived in the fourth century after Christ) it was converted into a chase, to keep wild beasts within the compass of its walls for the hunting of the latter kings of Persia. "We have learned (saith he) from a certain Elamite brother, who, coming out of those parts, now liveth as a monk at Jerusalem, that the royal huntings are in Babylon, and wild beasts of every kind are confined within the circuit of the walls." And a little after he saith, "that, excepting the brick walls, which, after many years, have been repaired for the enclosing of wild beasts, all the space within is entirely desolation."

Confirmation of various authors relative to the fulfilment of the prophecies concerning Babylon.

Of later authors the first who mentions any thing concerning Babylon is Benjamin of Tudela, a Jew, who lived in the twelfth century. In his itinerary, he says, "ancient Babylon is now laid waste; but some ruins are still to be seen of Nebuchadnezzar's palace; and men fear to enter them, on account of the serpents and scorpions which are in the midst of it." And Taxeira, a Portuguese, in the description of his travels from India to Italy, says, "of this great famous city there is nothing but only a few vestiges remaining, nor in the whole region is any place less frequented."

Benjamin Tudela's account of Babylon.

Such are the accounts given us of the state of Babylon by ancient authors: let us see what relation is given of it by the writers and travellers of modern date. The first we shall quote of these is one Rauwolf, a German traveller, who passed that way in the year 1574, and whose account of the ruins of this once famous city is as follows: "The village (says he) of Eulogo now lieth on the place where formerly old Babylon, the metropolis of Chaldaea, was situated. The harbour is a quarter of a league's distance from it, where people go ashore, in order to proceed by land to the celebrated city of Bagdat, which is a day and half's journey from thence eastward on the Tigris. This country is so dry and barren, that it cannot be tilled; and so bare, that I could never have believed that this powerful city, once the most stately

"and renowned in all the world, and situated in the pleasant and fruitful country of Shinar, could have ever stood there, if I had not known it by its situation, and many antiquities, of great beauty, which are still standing hereabout in great delolation. First, by the old bridge which was laid over the Euphrates, whereof there are some pieces and arches still remaining, built of burnt brick, and so strong that it is admirable. Just before the village of Eulogo is the hill whereon the castle stood, and the ruins of its fortification are still visible, though demolished and uninhabited. Behind it, at a small distance, stood the tower of Babylon. It is still to be seen, and is half a league in diameter, but so ruinous, so low, and so full of venomous creatures, which lodge in holes made by them in the rubbish, that no one durst approach nearer to it than within half a league, except during two months in the winter, when these animals never stir out of their holes. There is one fort particularly, which the inhabitants, in the language of the country, (which is Persian,) call Eglo, the poison whereof is very searching: they are larger than our lizard."

Petrus Val-
lensis's account of the ruins of Babylon.

Petrus Vallengis, (a noble Roman,) who was at Bagdat in the year 1616, and went to see the ruins (as they are thought to be) of ancient Babylon, informs us, that, "in the middle of a vast and level plain, about a quarter of a league from the Euphrates, which, in that place, runs westward, appears an heap of ruined buildings like a huge mountain, the materials of which are so confounded together, that one knows not what to make of it. Its situation and form correspond with that pyramid which Strabo calls the tower of Belus; and it is, in all likelihood, the tower of Nimrod, in Babylon, or Babel, as that place is still called. There appear no marks of ruins without the compass of that huge mass, to convince one so great a city as Babylon had ever stood there: all one discovers, within fifty or sixty paces of it, are only the remains here and there of some foundations of buildings: and the country round about it is so flat and level, that one can hardly believe it should be chosen for the situation of so great and noble a city as Babylon, or that there were ever any remarkable buildings on it: but, for my part, I am astonished there appears so much as there does, considering it is at least four thousand years since that city was built; and that Diodorus Siculus informs us, it was reduced almost to nothing in his time."

M. Taver-
nier's account.

Monf. Tavernier, a very celebrated traveller, tells us, that, "at the parting of the Tigris, which is but a little way from Bagdat, there is the foundation of a city, which seems to have been a large league in compass. There are some of the walls yet standing, upon which six coaches may go abreast: they are made of burnt brick, ten feet square, and three thick. The chronicles of the country say, here stood the ancient Babylon. Tavernier, however, did not think the ruins he saw to be those of Nebuchadnezzar's palace, or of the tower of Babel, as some have supposed they were. He adopts the opinion of the Arabs, and supposes them rather to be the remains of some tower, built by one of their princes for a beacon, to assemble his subjects in time of war, which, in all probability, was the real state of the case."

count.

The observations made by Mr. Salmon (in his Modern History) relative to Babylon, are certainly very just and pertinent. "What (says he) is as strange as any thing related of Babylon is, that we cannot learn, with certainty, either from ancient writers, or modern travellers, where this famous city stood, only in general, that it was situated in the province of Chaldæa, upon the river Euphrates, considerably above the place where it is united with the Tigris. Travellers have guessed, from the great ruins they have discovered in several parts of this country, that in this or that place Babylon once stood: but when we come to examine nicely the places they mention, we only learn that they are certainly wrong, and

"have taken the ruins of Seleucia, or some other great town, for those of Babylon."

The last traveller we shall mention, who takes notice of the ruins of Babylon, is Mr. Hanway, who, previous to his giving an account of the siege of Bagdat by Nadir Shah, prefaceth it in these words:

Mr. Han-way's account.

"Before we enter upon any circumstance relating to the siege of Bagdat, it may afford some light to the subject, to give a short account of this famous city, in the neighbourhood of which formerly stood the metropolis of one of the most ancient and most powerful monarchies in the world. The place is generally called Bagdat, or Bagdad; though some writers preserve the ancient name of Babylon. The reason of thus confounding these two cities is, that the Tigris and Euphrates, forming one common stream before they disem- bogue into the Persian gulph, are not unfrequently mentioned as one and the same river. It is certain that the present Bagdat is situated on the Tigris; but the ancient Babylon, according to all historians, both sacred and profane, was on the Euphrates. The ruins of the latter, which geographical writers place about fifteen leagues to the south of Bagdat, are now so much effaced, that there are hardly any vestiges of them to point out the situation. In the time of the emperor Theodosius there was only a great park remaining, in which the kings of Persia bred wild beasts for the amusement of hunting."

How evidently does it appear, from all these accounts, with what great punctuality time hath fulfilled the predictions of the prophets concerning Babylon! When it was converted into a chase for wild beasts to feed and breed there, then were exactly accomplished the words of the prophets, that "the wild beasts of the desert, with the wild beasts of the island should dwell there, and cry in their desolate houses." One part of the country was overflowed by the river having been turned out of its course, and never restored to its former channel, and thence became boggy and marshy; so that it might literally be said to be "a possession for the bittern and pools of water." Isaiah xiv. 23. Another part is described as dry and naked, and barren of every thing; so that thereby was also fulfilled another prophecy; "Her cities are a desolation, a dry land and a wilderness, a land wherein no man dwelleth, neither doth any son of man pass thereby." Jer. li. 43. The place thereabout is represented as over-run with serpents, scorpions, and all sorts of venomous and unclean creatures; so that "their houses are full of doleful creatures, and dragons cry in their pleasant palaces; and Babylon is become heaps, a dwelling-place for dragons, an astonishment and an hissing without an inhabitant." For all these reasons "neither can the Arabian pitch his tent there, neither can the shepherds make their folds there." And when we find that modern travellers cannot now certainly discover the spot of ground whereon this renowned city once was situated, we may very properly say, "How is Babylon become a desolation among the nations? Every purpote of the Lord hath he performed against Babylon, to make the land of Babylon a desolation without an inhabitant:" and the expression is no less true than sublime, that "the Lord of hosts hath swept it with the besom of destruction."

There-

Thus have we represented, in the most clear and undeniable light, the amazing prophecies which were foretold and fulfilled concerning the fate of the once magnificent city of Babylon. How wonderful are such predictions, compared with the events! and what a convincing argument it is of the truth and divinity of the Holy Scriptures! Well might God represent this as a memorable instance of his prescience, and challenge all the other false gods and their votaries to produce the like. "Who hath declared this from ancient time? have not I the Lord? and there is no God else beside me; a just God and a Saviour, there is none beside me; declaring the end from the beginning, and from ancient times the things that are not yet done, saying,

“My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure.” Isaiah xlv. 21. xlv. 10. And, indeed, where can we find a similar instance, but in Scripture, from the beginning of the world to the present time?

Prophecies concerning the city of Tyre.

Prophecies concerning the destruction of Tyre

ANOTHER memorable instance of the great truth of prophecy, is that of the destruction of Tyre. The inhabitants of this city, as well as those of Nineveh and Babylon, were great enemies to the Jews: but it was not altogether on this account that they were punished with the Divine vengeance; it was owing to their pride and self-sufficiency, both of which were founded on their great riches obtained by traffic, and for which they were more famous than any other nation whatever.

The destruction of Tyre was predicted by the prophets many years before it happened, and particularly by Isaiah and Ezekiel. But it hath been a matter of doubt among the learned, which of the Tyres was the subject of the prophecies, whether Palætyrus, or Old Tyre, that was seated on the continent, or New Tyre, that was built on an island nearly opposite. But the best answer to be given to this, and the most incontestible observation is, that the prophecies manifestly appertain to both, some expressions being applicable only to the former, and others only to the latter.

In one place Tyre is described as “situate at the entry of the sea,” Ezek. xxvii. 3; in others as “in the midst of the sea,” ver. 4 and 25. Sometimes it is represented as besieged “with horses and with chariots,” Ezek. xxvi. 7, &c. and at other times it is expressly called “an island, and the sea,” “even the strength of the sea,” Ezek. xxiii. 2. It is said, “By reason of the abundance of his horses their dust shall cover thee, thy walls shall shake at the noise of the horsemen, and of the wheels, and of the chariots when he shall enter into thy gates, as men enter into a city wherein is made a breach,” Ezek. xxvi. 10. It is afterwards said, “They shall break down thy walls, and destroy the pleasant houses, and they shall lay thy stones, and thy timber, and thy dust in the midst of the water,” Ezek. xxvi. 12. And again, “They shall bring thee down to the pit, and thou shalt die the deaths of them that are slain in the midst of the seas,” Ezek. xxviii. 8.

It is evident, from these expressions, that the insular Tyre, as well as the Tyre on the continent, is included in these prophecies. They are both comprehended under the same name, and both spoken of as one and the same city, one part being built on the continent, and the other on an adjoining island.

It was usual with the prophets, when they denounced the downfall and desolation of a city or kingdom, to describe, by way of contrast, its then flourishing condition, to show, in a stronger point of view, how Providence changeth the scene, and ordereth and disposeth all events. The prophets Isaiah and Ezekiel observe the same method with regard to Tyre. Isaiah speaketh of it as a place of great antiquity; “Is this your joyous city, whose antiquity is of antient days?” Is. xxiii. 7. And it is mentioned as a strong place so early as in the days of Joshua: “The strong city of Tyre,” Josh. xix. 29. Nay, there are even heathen authors who extol the great antiquity of the place. The Greek geographer Strabo saith, that, after Sidon, the greatest and most ancient city of the Phœnicians was Tyre, which was a rival to Sidon in greatness, and lustre, and antiquity.

Ancient, however, as this city was, it was the “daughter of Sidon,” as it is called by the prophet Isaiah, xxiii. 12. and “the merchants of Sidon, who pass over the sea, replenished it,” ver. 2. Sidon was the eldest son of Canaan, Gen. x. 15. and the city of Sidon is mentioned by the patriarch

Jacob, Gen. xlix. 13. In the days of Joshua it was called “Great Sidon,” Josh. xi. 8. And in the days of the Judges, the inhabitants of Laish are said to have “dwelt carelessly and secure, after the manner of the Sidonians,” Judges xviii. 7.

But though Tyre was the daughter of Sidon, yet the daughter soon equalled, and, in time, excelled the mother, and became the most celebrated place in the world for its trade and navigation, being the seat of commerce, and the center of riches. It is therefore called, by the prophet Isaiah, “a mart of nations, the crowning city, whose merchants are princes, whose traffickers are the honourable of the earth,” Isaiah xxxiii. 3, 8. And Ezekiel (as it were commenting on the words of Isaiah, “a mart of nations”) recounts the various nations whose commodities were brought to Tyre, and bought and sold by the Tyrians. Ezek. xxvii.

Tyre celebrated for its great trade and riches.

In this wealthy and flourishing condition was Tyre when the prophets foretold its destruction; one of whom (Isaiah) mentions it at least 125 years before it was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar. An extensive and beneficial trade in any city soon produces luxury and pride. So it fared with the Tyrians; and for these, and their other vices, as well as for their insults and injuries done to the Jews, the Divine vengeance was denounced upon them by the prophets.

Its destruction foretold by the prophets.

The prophet Isaiah mentions the pride of the Tyrians as being the principal occasion of their fall: “The Lord of hosts (saith he) hath proposed it, to stain the pride of all glory, and to bring into contempt all the honourable of the earth,” Is. xxiii. 9. Ezekiel describes at large their luxury, and particularly censures the pride of the king of Tyre, in arrogating to himself divine honours. “Because thou hast set thine heart at the heart of God, Behold, therefore, I will bring strangers upon thee, the terrible of the nations: and they shall draw their swords against the beauty of thy wisdom, and they shall defile thy brightness,” Ezek. xxviii. 6, &c.

The pride and luxury of the Tyrians the cause of their destruction.

The prophets Joel and Amos had before denounced the Divine Judgments on the Tyrians for their wickedness in general, and in particular for their cruelty to the children of Israel, and for buying and selling them like cattle in the markets. Thus saith the Lord by the prophet Joel: “Because ye have taken my silver and my gold, and have carried into your temples my goodly pleasant things: the children also of Judah, and the children of Jerusalem have ye sold unto the Grecians, that ye might remove them far from their border: Behold, I will raise them out of the place whither ye have sold them, and will return your recompence upon your own head,” Joel iii. 5, &c.

Judgments on the Tyrians denounced by the prophets Joel and Amos.

The prophet Amos speaketh to the same purpose: “Thus saith the Lord, for three transgressions of Tyrus, and for four I will not turn away the punishment thereof; because they delivered up the whole captivity to Edom, and remembered not the brotherly covenant,” Amos i. 9. By the latter part of these words, the prophet means the league and alliance between Hiram, king of Tyre, on the one part, and David and Solomon on the other.

The royal psalmist reckons the Tyrians among the most inveterate and implacable enemies of the Jewish name and nation: “The tabernacles of Edom (says he) and the Ishmaelites, of Moab, and the Hagarenes, Gabai, and Ammon, and Amalek, the Philistines, with the inhabitants of Tyre,” Psal. lxxxiii. 6, 7.

Ezekiel also begins his prophecy against the Tyrians, with a declaration that the judgments denounced against them were occasioned by their domineering over the Jews, and insulting them, after the taking of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. “Son of man, because that Tyrus hath said against Jerusalem, Aha, she is broken that was the gates Prophecy of Ezekiel against the Tyrians.

"of the people; she is turned unto me; I shall be replenished, now she is laid waste: Therefore thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I am against thee, O Tyrus, and will cause many nations to come up against thee, as the sea causeth his waves to come up." Ezekiel xxvi. 2, 3.

These were the circumstances which occasioned the prophecies against Tyre; and, by carefully considering and comparing them together, we shall find that they include the following particulars, viz.

1. That the city should be taken and destroyed by the Chaldeans, or Babylonians.
2. That the inhabitants should pass the Mediterranean into the islands and countries adjoining, and even there should not find a quiet settlement.
3. That the city should be restored after seventy years, and return to her gain and her merchandize.
4. That it should be taken and destroyed again.
5. That the people should, in time, forsake their idolatry, and become converts to the true religion and worship of God.
6. That the city should be totally destroyed, and become a place only for fishers to spread their nets upon.

On a proper examination into these respective particulars, we shall find that they were not only distinctly foretold, but likewise exactly fulfilled.

1. The city should be taken and destroyed by the Chaldeans. This is expressly foretold by the prophet Ezekiel, who says, "Thus saith the Lord God, Behold I will bring upon Tyrus, Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, a king of kings from the north, with horses and with chariots, and with horsemen, and companies, and much people: he shall slay the people by the sword, and thy strong garrisons shall go down to the ground." Ezek. xxvi. 7, 11. Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, had besieged Tyre without success; but Nebuchadnezzar was to prevail. The prophet Ezekiel not only foretold the siege, but he likewise mentions it afterwards as a past transaction: "Son of man, Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon caused his army to serve a great service against Tyrus; every head was made bald, and every shoulder was peeled." Ezekiel xxix. 18.

Fulfillment of the prophecies against Tyre.

Josephus tells us, that Nebuchadnezzar besieged Tyre thirteen years when Ithobal was king there, and that he subdued all Syria and Phœnicia. As the siege continued so long, the soldiers must consequently have endured many hardships; so that thereby we better understand the justness of Ezekiel's expression, that "Nebuchadnezzar caused his army to serve a great service against Tyrus; every head was made bald, and every shoulder was peeled." Such light doth prophane history cast upon sacred. It farther appears, from the Phœnician annals, that the Tyrians received their kings afterwards from Babylon, which plainly evinces that some of the blood royal must have been carried thither captives. The Phœnician annals likewise (as is clearly shewn by the learned Dr. Prideaux) agree exactly with Ezekiel's account of the time and year wherein the city was taken. Tyre, therefore, according to the prophecies, was subdued and taken by Nebuchadnezzar and the Chaldeans; after which we hear little more of that part of the city which stood upon the continent.

2. That the inhabitants of Tyre should pass over the Mediterranean into the islands and countries adjoining, and even there should find no quiet settlement. This is plainly signified by the prophet Isaiah: "Pass ye over to Tarshish," (that is, to Tartessus, in Spain;) "howl ye inhabitants of the isle." Isaiah xxiii. 6. And again, "Arise, pass over to Chittim," (that is, the islands and countries bordering upon the Mediterranean;) "there also shalt thou have no rest." Ver. 12. What the prophet here delivers by way of advice, is to be understood as a prediction. Ezekiel intimates the same thing: "The isles that are in the sea shall be troubled at thy departure." Ezekiel xxvi. 18.

The Phœnicians were the best navigators of antiquity; and the Tyrians, in particular, were celebrated for their shipping, and having colonies in different parts of the world. In this respect Tyre exceeded Sidon: she sent forth colonies into Africa and Spain; and Quintus Curtius saith, that her colonies were diffused almost over the whole world. The Tyrians, therefore, having planted colonies at Tarshish, and upon the coasts of Chittim, it was natural for them, when they were pressed with dangers and difficulties at home, to fly to their friends and countrymen abroad, for refuge and protection. That they really did so is asserted by St. Jerome, whose authority is founded on the Assyrian histories, which have been since lost. "We read (says he) in the histories of the Assyrians, that when the Tyrians were besieged, after they saw no hope of resisting the enemy, they went on board their ships, and fled to Carthage, or to some islands of the Ionian and Aegean Sea." And in another place he saith, "When the Tyrians saw that the works for carrying on the siege were perfected, and the foundations of the walls were shaken by the battering of the rams, whatsoever precious things in gold, silver, clothes, and various kinds of furniture the nobility had, they put them on board their ships, and carried them to the islands: so that the city being taken, Nebuchadnezzar found nothing worthy of his labours."

It must certainly have been very mortifying to Nebuchadnezzar, after so long and laborious a siege, to be disappointed of the spoil of so rich a city; and therefore Ezekiel was commissioned to promise the conquest of Egypt for his reward: "Son of man, Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon caused his army to serve a great service against Tyrus: every head was made bald, and every shoulder was peeled: yet had he no wages, nor his army for Tyrus, for the service that he had served against it. Therefore thus saith the Lord God, Behold I will give the land of Egypt unto Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, and he shall take her multitude, and take her spoil, and take her prey, and it shall be the wages for his army." Ezekiel xxix. 18, 19.

But though the Tyrians should pass over to Tarshish, and to Chittim, yet even there they should find no quiet settlement; "there also shalt thou have no rest." Megasthenes, who lived about 300 years before Christ, and was employed by Seleucus Nicanor in an embassy to the king of India, wrote an history of that country, in which he mentions Nebuchadnezzar as a man of the most distinguished valour and military prowess. This historian is quoted by several ancient authors; and he is particularly cited by Strabo and Josephus, for saying that Nebuchadnezzar surpassed Hercules in bravery and great exploits; that he subdued great part of Africa and Spain; and that he proceeded as far as the Pillars of Hercules.

It is reasonable to suppose that, after Nebuchadnezzar had subdued Tyre and Egypt, he carried his arms farther to the westward; and if he proceeded so far as Megasthenes reports, the Tyrians might well be said to "have no rest," the conqueror pursuing them from one country to another. But, besides this, and after this, the Carthaginians, and other colonies of the Tyrians, lived in a very wretched state. Their history consists of little more than wars and tumults. Sicily and Spain, Europe and Africa, the land, and their own element the sea, were theatres of their calamities and miseries, till at length not only the New, but Old Carthage likewise, was utterly destroyed. As the Carthaginians sprang from the Tyrians, and the Tyrians from the Sidonians, and Sidon was the first-born of Canaan, (see Gen. x. 15.) so the curse upon Canaan seemeth to have pursued them to the most distant parts of the earth.

3. The

Tyre to be restored after seventy years.

3. The city should be restored after seventy years, and return to her gain and her merchandize. This circumstance is expressly foretold by the prophet Isaiah: "And it shall come to pass in that day that Tyre shall be forgotten seventy years, according to the days of one king, (or kingdom, meaning the Babylonians, which was to continue seventy years;) after the end of seventy years shall Tyre sing as an harlot. Take an harp, go about the city, thou harlot that hast been forgotten, make sweet melody, sing many songs that thou mayest be remembered. And it shall come to pass after the end of seventy years, that the Lord will visit Tyre, and she shall turn to her hire, and shall commit fornication with all the kingdoms of the world upon the face of the earth." Isaiah xxiii. 15, 16, 17. The plain meaning of these figurative expressions is, that Tyre should lie neglected of traders and merchants for seventy years, as long as the Babylonian empire lasted, and after that she should recover her liberties and her trade, and draw in several of all nations to deal with her, and particularly the kings of the earth to buy her purples, which were worn chiefly by emperors and kings, and for which Tyre was more famous than any other place in the universe.

The time prefixed for the duration of the Babylonian empire was seventy years. So long were the nations to groan under that tyrannical yoke; though these nations were subdued, some sooner and some later than others. "These nations shall serve the king of Babylon seventy years: and it shall come to pass, when seventy years are accomplished, that I will punish the king of Babylon, and that nation, saith the Lord, for their iniquity, and the land of the Chaldeans, and will make it perpetual desolations." Jer. xxv. 11, 12. And accordingly, at the end of seventy years, Cyrus and the Persians subverted the Babylonian empire, and restored the conquered nations to their liberties.

Tyre was taken by Nebuchadnezzar in the 32d year of his reign; seventy years from which time brings us down to the 19th of Darius Hystaspis. At that time it appears from history, that the Romans had rebelled against Darius, and the Phœnicians assisted him with their fleets; and consequently it is reasonable to conclude that they were now restored to their former privileges. In the succeeding reign we find that they, together with the Sidonians, furnished Xerxes with several ships for his expedition into Greece. And by the time of Alexander the Great, the Tyrians were grown to such power and greatness, that they stopped the progress of that rapid conqueror longer than any part of the Persian empire besides. But all this is to be understood of the insular Tyre; for as the old city flourished most before the time of Nebuchadnezzar, so the new city flourished most afterwards; and this is the Tyre that henceforth is so much celebrated in history.

4. The city should be taken and destroyed again. "Howl ye inhabitants of the isle." Isaiah xxiii. 6. "What city is like Tyrus, like the destroyed in the midst of the sea?" Ezek. xxvii. 32. "They shall bring thee down to the pit, and thou shalt die the deaths of them that are slain in the midst of the seas." xxviii. 8. These expressions can imply no less than that the insular Tyre should be destroyed as well as that upon the continent; and as the one was accomplished by Nebuchadnezzar, so was the other by Alexander the Great. But the same thing may be inferred more directly from the words of Zechariah, who prophesied in the reign of Darius, (probably Darius Hystaspis,) many years after the former destruction of the city, and consequently he must be understood to speak of this latter. His words are these: "And Tyrus did build herself a strong hold, and heaped up silver as the dust, and fine gold as the mire of the streets. Behold the Lord will cast her out, and he will smite her power in the sea, and she shall be devoured with fire." Zech. ix. 3, 4. That Tyrus did build herself a strong hold is very certain; for her situation was exceeding strong in an island; and, besides the sea to defend her, she was fortified with a wall of 150 feet in height, and of a proportionable thickness. "She heaped up silver as the dust, and fine gold as the mire of the streets;" being the most celebrated place in the world for trade and riches, "the mart of nations," as she is called, conveying the commodities of the east to the west, and of the west to the east. But yet "Behold the Lord will cast her out, and he will smite her power in the sea, and she shall be devoured with fire." Ezekiel had likewise foretold that the city should be consumed with fire: "I will bring forth a fire from the midst of thee, it shall devour thee, and I will bring thee to ashes upon the earth, in the sight of all them that behold thee." Ezek. xxviii. 18. And accordingly Alexander besieged, and took, and set the city on fire. The ruins of old Tyre contributed much to the taking of the new city: for with the stones, timber, and rubbish of the old city, Alexander made a bank, or causeway, from the continent to the island; thereby literally fulfilling the words of the prophet; "They shall lay thy stones, and thy timber, and thy dust in the midst of the water." Ezek. xxvi. 12. Alexander was seven months in completing this work; but the time and labour were well employed; for, by means thereof, he was enabled to storm and take the city.

At the time Alexander reduced Tyre, great numbers of the inhabitants, as in the former siege, passed over the Mediterranean to the islands and countries adjoining. Both Diodorus Siculus and Quintus Curtius testify that they sent their wives and children to Carthage; and, upon the taking of the place, the Sidonians secretly conveyed away fifteen thousand more in their ships. Happy were they who thus escaped; for of those who remained behind, the conqueror slew eight thousand in storming and taking the city, caused two thousand afterwards to be crucified, and thirty thousand he sold for slaves. They had before sold some of the captive Jews; and now it was returned upon them, according to the prediction of Joel; "The children also of Judah, and the children of Jerusalem have ye sold; behold I will return your recompence upon your own head, and will sell your sons and your daughters." Joel iii. 6, 7, 8.

When the old city was taken, the Tyrians received their kings afterwards from Babylon; but when the new one was conquered by Alexander, their king held the sovereignty by his appointment. The cases are, in many respects, alike; but the city recovered much sooner from the calamities of the last siege than the first. In the space of nineteen years it was able to withstand the fleets and armies of Antigonus, and sustained a siege of fifteen months before it was taken; a plain proof (as Dean Prideaux observes) "of the great advantage of trade: for this city being the grand mart where most of the trade both of the east and west did center, by virtue hereof it was that it soon after revived to its pristine vigour."

5. There should come a time when the Tyrians would forsake their idolatry, and become converts to the true religion and worship of God. The Psalmist is thought to have hinted as much in saying, "The daughter of Tyre shall be therewith a gift." Psalm. xlv. 12. And again, "The kings of Tarshish and of the isles shall bring presents." Psalm. lxxii. 10. Zechariah, when he foretells the calamities which the Tyrians and neighbouring nations should suffer from Alexander, at the same time predicts their conversion to the true God; "but he that remaineth, even he shall be for our God." Zech. ix. 7. This prediction is more fully expressed by the prophet Isaiah, who says, "And her merchandise and her hire shall be holiness to the Lord: it shall not be treasured, nor laid up: for her merchandise shall be for them that dwell before the Lord, to eat sufficiently, and for durable clothing." Isaiah xxiii. 18.

The Tyrians were greatly addicted to the worship of Hercules, as he was called by the Greeks, or of Baal, as he is denominated in scripture. But, in in process of time, by means of some Jews and proselytes living and conversing among them, many were converted to the Jewish religion; so that "a great multitude of people from the sea coast of Tyre and Sidon came to hear Our Saviour, and to be healed of their diseases." Luke vi. 17. And when St. Paul, in his way to Jerusalem, came to Tyre, he found disciples there, who were inspired and prophesied; and with them "he tarried seven days." Acts xxi. 4.

The Tyrians become converts to Christianity

During the time of Dioclesian's persecution, the Tyrians were such sincere converts to Christianity, that many of them suffered the most horrid deaths, and died martyrs to the religion they then professed. After the storm of persecution was blown over, they (under the bishop Paulinus) built an oratory, or rather a temple, for the public worship of God, the most magnificent and sumptuous in all Palestine and Phœnicia. On this occasion Eusebius, on commenting on the passage of Isaiah, "And her merchandise and her hire shall be holiness to the Lord," says, "Since a church of God hath been founded in Tyre, as well as in other nations, many of its goods gotten by merchandize are consecrated to the Lord, being offered to his church (as he afterwards explains himself) for the use of the ministers of the altar or gospel, according to the institution of our Lord, that they who wait at the altar should live of the altar." In like manner speaks St. Jerome: "We may behold churches in Tyre built to Christ. We may see their riches that they are not laid up, nor treasured, but given to those who dwell before the Lord. For the Lord hath appointed, that they who preach the gospel should live by the gospel."

Tyre created into an archbishopric.

To these proofs we shall only add, that, as Tyre consecrated its merchandize and hire unto the Lord, so it had the honour not only of being created into an archbishopric, but was the first archbishopric under the patriarchate of Jerusalem, having fourteen bishops under its primacy; and in this state it continued several years.

6. But, after all, Tyre was to be totally destroyed, and become a place only for fishers to spread their nets upon. When the prophets denounced the destruction of any city or country, it was not intended that such denunciation should take effect immediately. It was threatened that Babylon should become a desolation without an inhabitant, but many ages passed before it was reduced to that condition; it decayed by degrees, till, at length, it came to nothing. In like manner Tyre was not to be ruined and desolated all at once. Many events were to happen previous to its final destruction, and before the prophecies of Ezekiel could be fully accomplished. "Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I am against thee, O Tyrus, and will cause many nations to come up against thee, as the sea causeth his waves to come up; and they shall destroy the walls of Tyrus, and break down her towers: I will also scrape her dust from her, and make her like the top of a rock: it shall be a place for the spreading of nets in the midst of the sea; for I have spoken it, saith the Lord God." Ezek. xxvi. 3, 4, 5. And again, "I will make thee a terror, and thou shalt be no more; though thou be sought for, yet shalt thou never be found again," ver. 21.

The prophecies of Tyre, like those relative to most other places, were to receive their completion by degrees. Nebuchadnezzar destroyed the old city, and Alexander employed the ruins and rubbish in making his causeway from the continent to the island, which henceforward were joined together. "It is no wonder, therefore, (as bishop Pocock observes,) that there are no signs of the ancient city; and, as it is a sandy shore, the face of every thing is altered; and the great aqueduct, in many parts, is almost buried in the sand." So that as to this part of the city, the prophecy hath been literally fulfilled. "Thou shalt be built no more; though thou be sought for, yet shalt thou never be found again."

It may be questioned whether the new city ever arose to that height of power, wealth, and greatness, to which it was elevated in the times of Isaiah and Ezekiel. It received a great blow from Alexander, not only by his taking and burning the city, but much more by his building of Alexandria, in Egypt, which, in time, deprived it of much of its trade, and thereby contributed more effectually to its ruin. It had the misfortune afterwards of changing its masters often, being sometimes in the hands of the Ptolemies, kings of Egypt, and sometimes of the kings of Syria, till at length it fell under the dominion of the Romans. It was taken by the Saracens about the year of Christ 639, in the reign of Omar, their third emperor. It was retaken by the Christians during the time of the holy war, in the year 1124; Baldwin the second of that name being then king of Jerusalem, and assisted by a fleet of the Venetians. From the Christians it was again taken, in the year 1289, by the Mamalucs of Egypt, under their Sultan Alphix, who sacked and razed this and Sidon, and other strong towns, that they might not ever again afford any harbour or shelter to the Christians. From the Mamalucs it was again taken, in the year 1516, by Selim, the ninth emperor of the Turks; and under their dominion it continues at present. But, alas! how fallen, how changed from what it was formerly! Instead of being the center of trade, and frequented by the merchant ships of the east and west, it is now become an heap of ruins, and visited only by a few poor fisherman. So that as to this part likewise of the city the prophecy has been literally fulfilled; "I will make thee like the top of a rock; thou shalt be a place to spread nets upon."

The description given of this once opulent and magnificent city by Mr. Maundrell, in his journey from Aleppo to Jerusalem, is as follows: "This city (saith he) standing in the sea upon a peninsula, promises, at a distance, something very magnificent. But when you come to it, you find no similitude of that glory for which it was so renowned in ancient times, and which is described by the prophet Ezekiel, chap. xxvi. &c. On the north side it hath an old Turkish ungarrisoned castle: besides which you see nothing here but a mere babel of broken walls, pillars, vaults, &c. there being not so much as one entire house left. Its present inhabitants are only a few poor wretches harbouring themselves in the vaults, and subsisting chiefly on fishing, who seem to be preserved in this place by Divine Providence, as a visible argument how God has fulfilled his word concerning Tyre," viz. "that it should be as the top of a rock, a place for fishers to dry their nets on."

Mr. Maundrell's description of Tyre.

This account of Mr. Maundrell's is corroborated by Mr. Middleton, in his New System of Geography. "This powerful city, (says he, speaking of Tyre,) once the capital of Phœnicia, the emporium of commerce, and mistress of the sea, equally famed for its trade, beauty, and opulence, and for many ages deemed impregnable, both from its almost inaccessible situation, and the strength of its fortifications made by art; is now a mere desert, and cannot boast of one house left entire. Its present inhabitants are only a few very poor people, who dwell in caverns, and subsist by fishing."

Such hath been the fate of the once famous city of Tyre, on which the Divine vengeance was denounced for the great pride of its inhabitants; and in the destruction of which we have an additional instance, to those already mentioned, of the great truth of the Divine predictions, as spoken by the mouths of the prophets.

CHAP. X.

Prophecies concerning Egypt.

EGYPT is one of the most ancient kingdoms in the world, it having been in a very flourishing state even during the days of Abraham; and the inhabitants

habitants of it were distinguished for having more wisdom than any other people at that time on the face of the earth. It was (as we may call it) the great academy of the earlier ages. Hither the wits and sages of Greece and other countries repaired, and received their learning at this fountain. It is mentioned to the commendation of Moses, that he "was learned in the wisdom of the Egyptians." Acts vii. 22. And the highest character given of Solomon's wisdom is, that it "excelled the wisdom of all the children of the east country, and all the wisdom of Egypt." 1 Kings iv. 30. But with this wisdom it was early corrupted, and was as much the parent of superstition as it was the mistress of learning; and the one, as well as the other, were from thence propagated and diffused over other countries. It was, indeed, the grand corruptor of the world; the source of Polytheism and idolatry to several of the eastern, and to most of the western, nations; and at length degenerated to such a degree, as not to be equalled by any other country in the universe.

When the Israelites remained in Egypt during their state of bondage, they acquired many of the maxims of the natives, and retained a fondness for the Egyptian idols ever after. Several of Moses's laws and institutions were evidently calculated to wean them from, and to guard them against, the manners and customs of the Egyptians. But still, in their hearts and affections, they were much inclined to return into Egypt. Even Solomon married a woman from that country: and, on many occasions, the Israelites courted the friendship and alliance of Egypt, in preference to any of the neighbouring powers. This prejudice is the more extraordinary, as the Egyptians generally treated them not only with disrespect, but took every advantage they could of doing them the greatest injuries. They oppressed them with the most cruel servitude during their state of bondage. They at length gave them leave to depart, and then pursued them as fugitives. Shishak, king of Egypt, came up against Jerusalem, and plundered it. 1 Kings xiv. 25, 26. And in all their leagues and alliances, Egypt was to the Israelites as "a broken reed, whereon if a man lean, it will go into his hand, and pierce it." Isaiah xxxvi. 6.

When we consider these circumstances, it is not to be wondered at that Egypt should be the subject of several prophecies; and we shall find, on examination, that these prophecies consisted of the principal revolutions that were to happen in that kingdom, and which were to take place from the days of the prophets, and continue to the present time.

The first great revolution that happened in Egypt (after the prophecies denounced against it) was the conquest of it by Nebuchadnezzar, which was particularly foretold by Jeremiah and Ezekiel. These two prophets have employed several sections, or chapters, upon this occasion. Jeremiah was carried into Egypt, where he foretold the conquest of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon: and some of his prophecies are intitled, "The word that the Lord spake to Jeremiah the prophet, how Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon should come and smite the land of Egypt." Jer. xlvi. 13. Ezekiel also declares, "Thus saith the Lord God, I will also make the multitude of Egypt to cease by the hand of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon: he and his people with him, the terrible of the nations shall be brought to destroy the land; and they shall draw their swords against Egypt, and fill the land with the slain." Ezekiel xxx. 10, 11. The conquest of this kingdom was promised to Nebuchadnezzar as a reward for his services against Tyre, which, after a long siege, he took and destroyed, but was disappointed of the spoil, as we have already observed in the foregoing chapter.

That this prophecy was strictly fulfilled, appears from the testimonies of Megasthenes and Berofus, two heathen historians; one of whom expressly affirms, that Nebuchadnezzar conquered the greatest part of Africa; and the other affirms it in effect, by saying, that, when Nebuchadnezzar heard of the death of his father, having settled his affairs in Egypt, and committed the captives, whom he took there, to the care of some of his friends, to bring them after him, he hastened directly to Babylon.

The testimonies of these two are confirmed by Josephus, who says that Nebuchadnezzar, having subdued Cælo-Syria, waged war against the Ammonites and Moabites; and having conquered them, he invaded Egypt, slew Pharaoh-Hophra, their king, and appointed another in his stead. This monarch is represented by Ezekiel as an arrogant, impious prince: he calls him "the great dragon (or crocodile) that lieth in the midst of his rivers, which hath said, my river is my own, and I have made it for myself." Ezekiel xxix. 4. Agreeable to this, Herodotus informs us, that he proudly and wickedly boasted of having established his kingdom so surely, that it was not in the power of God himself to dispossess him of it. For this presumption he was justly cut off, and the prediction foretold by Jeremiah was fully accomplished: "Thus saith the Lord, Behold, I will give Pharaoh-Hophra king of Egypt into the hand of his enemies, and into the hand of them that seek his life." Jer. xliv. 30.

It was foretold by the prophet Ezekiel, that the country should be desolate forty years, and the people carried captives into other countries: "I will make the land of Egypt desolate forty years; and I will scatter the Egyptians among the nations, and will disperse them through the countries." Ezek. xxix. 12. Though it cannot, indeed, be proved, from heathen authors, that this desolation of the country continued exactly forty years, yet there is not the least doubt but this, as well as the other conquered countries, laboured under the Babylonish yoke till the time of Cyrus. We are assured by Berofus, that Nebuchadnezzar took several captives from Egypt, and carried them to Babylon: and from Megasthenes we learn, that he transplanted and settled others in Pontus. So true it is that they were "scattered among the nations, and dispersed through the countries;" and the greater part of them might, probably, after the dissolution of the Babylonish empire, return to their native country.

The next memorable revolution that happened in Egypt, was the invasion and subduetion of it by Cambyfes and the Persians, which is the principal subject of the 19th chapter of the prophet Isaiah. Some parts, indeed, of this prophecy have a near affinity with those of Jeremiah and Ezekiel concerning the conquest of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar: but this prophecy, as well as several others, might admit of a double completion, and be fulfilled at both those periods. This prophecy of Isaiah is a general representation of the calamities that should befall the nation: it includes various particulars, and is applicable to Nebuchadnezzar and the Babylonians, as well as to Cambyfes and the Persians. They might, therefore, be both intended and comprehended in it; but the latter, it is most reasonable to imagine, were principally meant, and for this reason, because the deliverance of the Egyptians by some great conqueror, and their conversion afterwards to the true religion, which are foretold in the latter part of this chapter, were events consequent to the dominion of the Persians, and not to that of the Babylonians.

Isaiah begins his prophecy against Egypt with declaring, that the conquest of it should be swift and sudden, and that the idols of Egypt should be destroyed. "Behold (says he) the Lord rideth upon a swift cloud, and shall come into Egypt, and the idols of Egypt shall be moved at his presence, and the heart of Egypt shall melt in the midst of it." Isaiah xix. 1. The same thing is foretold of Nebuchadnezzar by the prophet Jeremiah: "And when he cometh, he shall smite the land of Egypt. And I will kindle a fire in the houses of the gods of Egypt, and he shall burn them, and carry Egypt subdued by the Persians.

The conquest of Egypt to be swift and sudden.

" carry them away captives. He shall break also the images of Bethshemesh, that is in the land of Egypt; and the houses of the gods of the Egyptians shall he burn with fire. Jer. xliii. 11, &c. And again the prophet Ezekiel: " Thus saith the Lord God, I will also destroy the idols, and I will cause their images to cease out of Noph, or Memphis." Ezek. xxx. 13.

The first attempt made by Cambyfes was upon Pelusium, a strong town at the entrance of Egypt, and key of the kingdom; and he succeeded by the stratagem of placing before his army a great number of dogs, sheep, cats, and other animals, which being held sacred by the Egyptians, not one of them would cast a javelin, or shoot an arrow that way; and so the town was stormed and taken, in a manner, without resistance. He treated the gods of Egypt with great contempt, laughed at the people, and chastised the priests for worshipping such deities. He slew Apis, or the sacred ox, (which the Egyptians worshipped,) with his own hand; and burnt and demolished their other idols and temples; and would likewise, if he had not been prevented, have destroyed the famous temple of Jupiter Ammon. Ochus too, who was another king of Persia, and subdued the Egyptians again after they had revolted, plundered their temples, and caused another Apis to be slain, and served up at a banquet he had appointed in consequence of his victories.

Egypt to be distracted with civil wars.

It was also foretold, by the prophet Isaiah, that they should be miserably distracted with civil wars: " And I will set the Egyptians against the Egyptians; and they shall fight every one against his brother, and every one against his neighbour, city against city, and kingdom against kingdom." Isaiah xix. 2. Egypt was divided into twelve prefectures, or provinces, over each of which presided a petty prince, or governor. These disagreeing with each other, civil wars took place, and, for a considerable time, the whole kingdom was one continued scene of anarchy and confusion. It is, therefore, little to be wondered at, that, in such distractions as these, the Egyptians, who were naturally a cowardly people, should be destitute of counsel, and that " the spirit of Egypt should fail in the midst thereof," as is foretold by the prophet in ver. 3. and that being also a very superstitious people, " they should seek to the idols, and to the charmers, and to them that have familiar spirits, and to the wizards." But their divination was all in vain; it was their fate to be subdued and oppressed by cruel lords and tyrants: " And the Egyptians will I give over into the hand of a cruel lord; and a fierce king shall rule over them, saith the Lord, the Lord of hosts," ver. 4. This is a very essential part of the prophecy, and may, with the greatest propriety and justice, be applied to the Persians, and especially to Cambyfes and Ochus, the former of whom put the yoke on the neck of the Egyptians, and the latter riveted it. Ochus was the cruellest and worst of all the kings of Persia; and was so destructive and oppressive to Egypt in particular, that his favourite eunuch, Bagoas, who was an Egyptian, in revenge of his injured country, poisoned him. No other allegation is wanting to prove that the Persian yoke was more galling and intolerable to the Egyptians than their frequent revolts and rebellions, which, instead of being any benefit to them, only served to enslave them the more, and augment their misery.

Ochus, king of Persia, cruelly treats the Egyptians.

The prophet, after denouncing these judgments against the Egyptians, next proceeds to set forth, in figurative language, the consequences of this subjection and slavery, the poverty and want, the mourning and lamentation, the confusion and misery, which should be entailed on them and their posterity: after which he recounts the immediate causes of these evils, the folly of the princes and rulers, who valued themselves upon their wisdom, and the cowardice and effeminacy of the people in general. These things will plainly appear to any one who attentively peruses the history of that nation, the particulars of which are too considerable to be here admitted. It may, however, in general, be said, that Egypt would not have become a prey to so many foreign enemies, had it not been for the excessive weakness of the people, both in counsel and in action. They had not the courage even to defend themselves. They trusted chiefly to their Grecian and other mercenaries, who, instead of defending, were often the first to betray them.

The next memorable revolution was effected by Alexander the Great, who subverted the Persian empire in Egypt, as well as in other places; and this event is particularly pointed out in the same 19th chapter of the prophet Isaiah. It is also foretold, that, about the same time, several of the Egyptians should lay aside their idolatry, and be converted to the worship of the true God. " In that day shall there be an altar to the Lord in the midst of the land of Egypt, and a pillar at the border thereof to the Lord. And it shall be for a sign, and for a witness unto the Lord of hosts in the land of Egypt: for they shall cry unto the Lord because of the oppressor, and he shall send them a saviour, and a great one, and he shall deliver them. And the Lord shall be known to Egypt, and the Egyptians shall know the Lord in that day, and shall do sacrifice and oblation, yea, they shall vow a vow unto the Lord, and perform it." Isaiah xix. 19, &c.

Revolution in Egypt, Alexander the Great.

The prophet then proceeds to show, that Assyria and Egypt, which used to be at great enmity with each other, should be united in the same worship by the intermediation of Israel, and that those three should be a blessing on the earth. " In that day shall there be a highway out of Egypt to Assyria, and the Assyrian shall come into Egypt, and the Egyptian in Assyria, and the Egyptians shall serve with the Assyrians. In that day shall Israel be the third with Egypt, and with Assyria, even a blessing in the midst of the land: whom the Lord shall bless, saying, Blessed be Egypt my people, and Assyria the work of my hands, and Israel mine inheritance," ver. 23, &c.

The Egyptians united in the same worship.

It is clearly foretold by the prophet, that a great prince, from a foreign country, should deliver the Egyptians from their Persian oppressors, and heal their country, which was smitten of God, and afflicted. And who could this be but Alexander, who is always distinguished by the additional epithet the Great, and whose first successor in Egypt was called the great Ptolemy, and Ptolemy Soter, or the saviour? When Alexander went first into Egypt, the people all cheerfully submitted to him out of hatred to the Persians, so that he became master of the country without any opposition. For this reason he treated them with great humanity and kindness, built a city there, which, after his own name, he called Alexandria, appointed one of his own country for their civil governor, and permitted them to be governed by their own laws and customs. By these changes and regulations, and by the prudent and gentle administration of some of the first Ptolemies, Egypt revived, trade and learning flourished, and, for a time, the land was blessed with peace and plenty.

The Egyptians delivered from their Persian oppressors.

The prophet likewise foretells, that, about the same time, the true religion, and the true worship of the God of Israel, should begin to spread, and prevail in the land of Egypt; and what event was ever more unlikely to happen than the conversion of a people so lost in superstition and idolatry of the worst and grossest kind? But that it did happen will appear from what follows.

The true religion began to prevail in Egypt.

It is certain that many of the Jews, after Nebuchadnezzar had taken Jerusalem, fled into Egypt, and with them went Jeremiah the prophet, who there delivered most of his prophecies concerning the conquest of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar. From thence some knowledge of God, and some notices of the prophecies, might easily be received by the Egyptians. This alteration was to take place principally in five cities, which accordingly came to pass. The first city in which the true worship of God was received was Heliopolis; the second Migdol, or Magdolum; the third, Tahpanhes, or Daphne; the fourth, Noph, or Memphis; and the fifth, in the country of Pathros, or Thebais; all of which are particularly particularly mentioned by the prophet Jeremiah, chap. xlv. 1.

Five cities in which the true worship of God was received.

In these cities, at that time, many Jews resided; and though they were, in general, very wicked men, and disobedient to the word of God, yet, no doubt, some good people were mingled among them, who might relate to them the prophecies of Jeremiah; and they themselves, when they saw them fulfilled, might embrace the Jewish religion. This, however, is not to be understood of all the inhabitants of those places, but only of some, which is sufficient to justify the expression of "five cities speaking the language of Canaan, and swearing by the Lord of hosts." The prediction of the prophet Zephaniah is to the same effect: "Then will I turn to the people a pure language, that they may call upon the name of the Lord to serve him with one consent." Zeph. iii. 9.

Alexander the Great sends many Jews to Alexandria

After Alexander the Great had made a conquest of Egypt, he transplanted many of the Jews into his new city of Alexandria, and allowed them many privileges and immunities equal to those enjoyed by the Macedonians. Ptolemy Soter carried more of them into Egypt, and they received such indulgencies, that many others followed them of their own accord. Ptolemy Philadelphus redeemed and released the captive Jews; and in his reign, or his father's, the books of Moses were translated into Greek, and afterwards the other parts of the Old Testament. The third Ptolemy, called Energetes, having subdued all Syria, did not sacrifice to the idols of Egypt, in acknowledgment of his victory; but, going to Jerusalem, made his oblations to God, after the manner of the Jews; and his example, no doubt, was followed by many of his subjects. The sixth Ptolemy, called Philometor, committed the whole management of his kingdom to two Jews, Onias and Dositheus, who were his chief ministers and generals, and had the principal direction of all affairs, both civil and military. This Onias obtained a licence from the king to build a temple for the Jews in Egypt, like that at Jerusalem, alleging for the purpose this very prophecy of Isaiah, that there should "be an altar to the Lord in the midst of the land of Egypt;" and the king and queen, in their edict, made honourable mention of the law, and of the prophet Isaiah, and express a dread of sinning against God. The place, chosen for the building of this temple, was in the prefecture of Heliopolis, or "the city of the sun," which place is likewise mentioned in the prophecy. It was built after the model of the temple at Jerusalem, but not so sumptuous and magnificent. Philometor himself was made high-priest: other priests and Levites were appointed for the ministration; and Divine service was daily performed there in the same manner as at Jerusalem. By these means "the Egyptians must have known the Lord;" and without doubt there must have been many proselytes among them. Amidst those who came up to the feast of Pentecost, there are particularly mentioned "the dwellers in Egypt, and in the parts of Lybia about Cyrene, Jews and proselytes." Acts ii. 10.

Thus were the Jews settled and encouraged in Egypt; nor were they less favoured by the kings of Syria. Seleucus Nicanor made them free of the cities which he built in Asia and the Lower Syria, and even of Antioch, the capital of his kingdom; and granted the same rights and privileges to them as to the Greeks and Macedonians. Antiochus the Great published several decrees in favour of the Jews, both of those who inhabited Jerusalem, and of those who dwelt in Mesopotamia and Babylon. And thus, by means of the Jews and proselytes dwelling in Egypt and Syria, Israel, Egypt, and Syria, were, in some measure, united in the same worship. But this was more fully accomplished when the inhabitants of these countries became Christians, and were made members of the church of Christ. And it is to be seriously hoped and believed, that the prophecy will still receive its most perfect completion in the latter days, when Mahometism shall be rooted out, and Christianity shall flourish in these countries; when "the fulness of the Gentiles shall come in, and all Israel shall be saved."

The fate of Egypt, from the days of Nebuchadnezzar to the present period, is predicted, in a most remarkable manner, by the prophet Ezekiel. He foretells that, after the desolation of the land, it "should be a bare kingdom: it shall be the barest of the kingdoms, neither shall it exalt itself any more above the nations: for I will diminish them, that they shall no more rule over the nations." Ezek. xxix. 14, 15. And again, "I will sell the land into the hand of the wicked, and I will make the land waste, and all that is therein, by the hand of strangers: and there shall be no more a prince of the land of Egypt." Ezek. xxx. 12, 13.

Ezekiel's prophecy concerning Egypt.

In order to point out the great truth of the fulfilment of this remarkable prophecy, we must advert to, and make a short deduction from, the Egyptian history, at least that part of it which contains the various circumstances that took place from the subduktion of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar, to the present period.

After Nebuchadnezzar had conquered the Egyptians, he appointed Amasis for their king; and as he held his crown by the permission and allowance of the Babylonians, there is not the least doubt but he paid them tribute for it. Berotus, the Chaldean historian, speaketh of Nebuchadnezzar's reducing Egypt to his obedience, and afterwards of his settling the affairs of the country, and carrying away captives from thence to Babylon. By his settling the affairs of Egypt, nothing less could be meant than his appointing the governors, and the tribute they should pay to him: and by carrying some Egyptians captives to Babylon, he certainly intended not only to weaken the country, but also to have them as hostages to secure the obedience of the rest, and the payment of their tribute.

After the fall of the Babylonish empire, Cyrus established the Persian on its ruins; and it is affirmed, by that faithful and elegant historian Xenophon, that Cyrus also conquered Egypt, and made it part of his empire. But whether this was so or not, it is universally allowed that Cambyzes, the son of Cyrus, did conquer Egypt, and deprived Plammenitus (the then king) of his crown, to which he had newly succeeded upon the death of Amasis. Cambyzes intended to have made Plammenitus administrator of the kingdom under him, as it was the custom of the Persians to do to the conquered princes; but Plammenitus forming schemes to recover the kingdom, and being convicted thereof, was put to death. The Egyptians groaned under the yoke near forty years. They then revolted towards the latter end of the reign of Darius, the son of Hystaspis; but his son and successor Xerxes, in the second year of his reign, subdued them again, and reduced them to a worse condition of servitude than they had been in under Darius, and appointed his brother Achæmenes governor of Egypt. About twenty-four years after this (when the Egyptians heard of the troubles in Persia about the succession to the throne after the death of Xerxes) they revolted again, at the instigation of Inarus, king of Lybia; and having driven away the Persian tribute-collectors, they constituted Inarus their king. Six years were employed in reducing them to obedience; and all Egypt submitted again to king Artaxerxes Longimanus, except Amyrtæus, who reigned in the fens, whither the Persians could not approach to take him. Inarus, who was the author of these evils, being betrayed to the Persians, was taken and crucified. They, however, permitted his son Thannyras to succeed his father in the kingdom of Lybia; and Egypt continued in subjection all the remaining part of the long reign of Artaxerxes. In the tenth year of Darius Nothus they revolted again, under the conduct of Amyrtæus, who sallied out of the fens, drove the Persians from Egypt, and made himself master of the country. Amyrtæus was succeeded by his son Pausiris, who, according to Herodotus, rodotus, obtained the kingdom by favour of the Persians; from whence it appears that the Persians had again subdued Egypt, or, at least, that the king was not established without their consent and approbation. It is certain, however, that, after this, the Egyptians gave much trouble to the Persians. Artaxerxes Mnemon made several efforts to reconquer the country, but they all proved ineffectual. It was not totally and finally subdued till the ninth year of the following reign of Ochus, about 350 years before Christ, when Nectanebus, the last king, fled into Ethiopia, and Ochus became absolute master of the country; and having appointed one of his nobles, named Pherendates, to be his viceroy and governor of Egypt, he returned, with great glory, and with immense treasures, to Babylon. Egypt from that time hath never been able to recover its liberties: it hath always been subject to strangers, and never governed by a king of its own; whereby hath been amply fulfilled that part of Ezekiel's prophecy, in which it is said, "there shall be no more a prince of the land of Egypt."

After the Persians, Egypt came into the hands of the Macedonians. It submitted to Alexander the Great without attempting the least resistance; and on his death it fell to the share of Ptolemy, one of his four famous captains, and was governed by his family for several generations. The two or three first of the Ptolemies were wise and potent princes; but most of the rest (of which there were eleven in number) were prodigies of luxury and wickedness. It is observed by Strabo, that all after the third Ptolemy governed very ill; but those who governed worst of all were the fourth, the seventh, and the last, called Auletes. The persons here alluded to by Strabo were, Ptolemy Philopater, or the lover of his father, so called by way of irony, because he was a parricide, and murdered both his father and mother: Ptolemy Physcon, who affected the title of Eucrgetes, or the benefactor; but the Alexandrians more justly named him Kakergetes, or the malefactor, on account of his distinguished wickedness: and Ptolemy Auletes, or the piper, so denominated because he spent much of his time playing on the pipe, and used to contend for the prize in the public shows. This kingdom of the Macedonians continued from the death of Alexander 294 years, and ended in the famous Cleopatra, who was one of the most ambitious and wicked princesses that ever sat upon a throne.

Egypt falls under the dominion of the Romans

After the downfall of the Macedonians, Egypt fell under the dominion of the Romans. They had, indeed, either by virtue of treaties, or by force of arms, obtained a great authority there, and were, in a manner, arbiters of the kingdom before. But after the death of Cleopatra, Octavius Cæsar reduced it into the form of a Roman province, and appointed Cornelius Gallus the first prefect or governor. It remained in this state, with little variation, till the year 641 after Christ, that is 670 years in the whole, from the reign of Augustus Cæsar to that of the emperor Heraclius. It was at that period that the Saracens, in the reign of Omar, their third emperor, and under the command of Amrou, invaded and conquered Egypt, took Misrah (formerly called Memphis, but now Cairo) by storm, and also Alexandria, after they had besieged it fourteen months, and had lost no less than 23,000 men. But the greatest loss in the destruction of the latter place was the famous library, founded by the first Ptolemies, and so much enlarged and improved by their successors, that the books contained in it amounted to 700,000 volumes, all of which were committed to the flames. Before this event Egypt was frequented by learned foreigners from almost all parts, and it produced several learned natives; but afterwards it became more and more a base kingdom, and sunk into the greatest ignorance and superstition. Mahometism was established there instead of Christianity, and the government of the caliphs and sultans continued till about the year 1250 after Christ.

It was about this time that the Mamalucs usurped

the royal authority. Their government began with the Sultan Ibeg, in the 648th year of the Hegira, and in the year of Christ 1250, and continued through a series of twenty-four Turkish and twenty-three Circassian Mamaluc Sultans, ending with Tumanbai, in the year of Christ 1517. At that time Selim, the ninth emperor of the Turks conquered the Mamalucs, hanged their last Sultan Tumanbai before one of the gates of Cairo, and put an end to their government. He caused five hundred of the chiefest Egyptian families to be transplanted to Constantinople, as likewise great numbers of the wives and children of the Mamalucs, besides the Sultan's treasure, and other immense riches; and annexed Egypt to the Ottoman empire, whereof it hath continued a province from that day to this. It is governed by a Turkish basha, with twenty-four begs, or princes, under him, who are advanced from servitude to the administration of public affairs; a superstitious notion possessing the Egyptians, that it is decreed by fate, that captives shall reign, and the natives be subject to them. But it is not merely a superstitious notion, but a notion, in all probability, at first derived from some tradition of these prophecies, that "Egypt should be a base kingdom," and that "there should be no more a prince of the land of Egypt."

Such are the events which have taken place in Egypt, and such has been the fulfilment of the prophecy of Ezekiel, relative to the destruction of this once flourishing and important kingdom. At the time this prophecy was delivered, who could pretend to say, upon human conjecture, that so great a kingdom, so rich and fertile a country, should ever after become tributary and subject to strangers? It is now more than two thousand years since this prophecy was first delivered; and what likelihood or appearance was there that the Egyptians should, for so many ages, bow under a foreign yoke, and never, in all that time, be able to recover their liberties, and have a prince of their own to reign over them? But as is the prophecy, so is the event: for not long after it was delivered, Egypt was conquered by the Babylonians, and after the Babylonians by the Persians; and after the Persians it became subject to the Macedonians, and after the Macedonians to the Romans, and after the Romans to the Saracens, and then to the Mamalucs; and it is now a province to the Turkish empire.

We have now beheld in what manner the cities of Nineveh, Babylon, Tyre, and Egypt, four of the greatest kingdoms (during their respective flourishing states) in the universe, were visited by Divine vengeance, for their enmity to, and persecution of, the Jews, the chosen people of God. But, besides this sin, all these nations were guilty of many others. Egypt, in particular, was so severely threatened for her idolatry, her pride, and her wickedness. The Egyptians have generally been more wicked than other nations. Ancient authors describe them every where as superstitious and luxurious, as an unwarlike and unserviceable people, as a faithless and falacious nation, always meaning one thing and pretending another, as lovers of wine and strong drink, as cruel in their anger, as thieves, and tolerating all kinds of theft, as patient of tortures, and, though put to the rack, choosing rather to die than confess the truth. Modern authors paint them still in blacker colours. The famous Thevenot is very strong and severe; "The people of Egypt (says he, generally speaking) are all swarthy, exceeding wicked, great rogues, cowardly, lazy, hypocrites, liars, robbers, treacherous, so very greedy of money, that they will kill a man for a maiden, or three half-pence." Bishop Pocock's character of them is not much more favourable, tho' not so harsh and opprobrious: "The natives of Egypt (says he) are now a slothful people, and delight in sitting still, hearing tales, and, indeed, seem always to have been more fit for the quiet life than for any active scenes. They are also malicious and envious to a great degree, which keeps them from uniting and setting up for themselves; and though they are very ignorant, yet they have a natural cunning and artifice, as well as falshood, falsehood, and this makes them always suspicious of travellers. The love of money is so rooted in them, that nothing is to be done without bribery. They think the greatest villanies are expiated, when once they have washed their hands and feet. Their words pass for nothing, either in relations, promises, or professions of friendship, &c."

Present state
gyptians.

Such is the state of the Egyptians at the present period, and such has been the punishment inflicted on them for their manifold sins and transgressions, whereby that excellent political aphorism of the wisest of kings is fully verified; "righteousness exalteth a nation, but sin is a reproach and ruin to any people." Prov. xiv. 34.

The Prophecies of Daniel.

The prophecies of
Daniel.

THE first prophecy of Daniel, and on which, indeed, all the succeeding ones were founded, was his interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar's dream. This monarch, in the second year of his reign, having subdued all his enemies, and firmly established his throne, was thinking "upon his bed what should come to pass hereafter;" what should be the future success of his family and kingdom; and whether any, or what families and kingdoms, might arise after his own; and, as our waking thoughts generally give some tincture to our dreams, he dreamed of something to the same purpose, which astonished him, but which he could not rightly understand. The dream greatly affected him at the time; but, awaking in confusion, he had but an imperfect remembrance of it. He therefore called for "the magicians and astrologers," and, as absurdly as impiously, demanded of them, upon pain of death and destruction, "to make known unto him both the dream and the interpretation thereof." They answered, with great reason, that no king had ever required such a thing; that it transcended all the powers and faculties of man; and that God alone, or only beings like him, could disclose it. "There is not a man upon earth that can show the king's matter; therefore there is no king, lord, or ruler, that asked such things at any magician, astrologer, or Chaldean: and it is a rare thing that the king requireth, and there is none other that can show it before the king, except the God, whose dwelling is not of the flesh." Dan. ii. 10, 11.

Nebuchadnezzar orders the wise men of Babylon to be destroyed

But the pride of absolute power cannot listen to reason, or hear any controul. Nebuchadnezzar was so incensed at this reply, that he ordered all the magicians and wise men of Babylon to be destroyed. For this cause the king was angry and very furious, and commanded to destroy all the wise men of Babylon; ver. 12. Daniel and his companions would have been involved in the same fate as the rest; but, by their joint and earnest prayers to God, "the secret was revealed unto Daniel in a night-vision; and Daniel blessed the God of heaven."

They are preserved by means of Daniel.

Daniel, having received these instructions, was desirous to save the lives of the wise men of Babylon, who were so unjustly condemned, as well as his own. He therefore "went unto Arioch, the captain of the king's guard, whom the king had ordered to destroy the wise men of Babylon; and said thus unto him, Destroy not the wise men of Babylon; bring me in before the king, and I will show unto the king the interpretation;" ver. 12. &c. The captain of the guard immediately introduced him to the king, saying, "I have found a man of the captives of Judah that will make known unto the king the interpretation;" ver. 25. Daniel was far from assuming any merit to himself: he modestly told Nebuchadnezzar, that "this secret, which the wise men, astrologers, magicians, and soothsayers could not show unto the king, was not revealed to him for any wisdom that he had more than others: but (says he) there is a God in heaven that revealeth secrets, and maketh known to the king Nebuchadnezzar what shall be in the latter days." Dan. ii. 27, &c. Having said this, Daniel not only told him what he saw in his dream, but also what he thought within himself before his dream. "As for thee, O king, thy thoughts came into thy mind, upon thy bed, what should come to pass hereafter: and he that revealeth secrets maketh known unto thee what shall come to pass."

Daniel tells
nezzar his dream.

Nebuchadnezzar's dream was of "a great image." This great image, whose brightness was excellent, stood before him, and the form thereof was terrible." It appears, from ancient coins, that cities and people were often represented by figures of men and women. A great terrible figure was therefore not an improper emblem of human power and dominion; and the various metals of which it was composed, not unfitly typified the various kingdoms which should arise. It consisted of four different metals, gold and silver, and brass and iron, with clay; and these four metals, according to Daniel's own interpretation, mean so many kingdoms: and the order of their succession is clearly denoted by the order of the parts, the head and higher parts signifying the earlier times, and the lower parts the latter times. From hence it is conjectured by Calvin, the poets drew their fables of the four ages of the world, namely, the golden, the silver, the brazen, and the iron age.

Substance of
nezzar's
dream.

These different kingdoms will naturally constitute the different heads of our discourse on Daniel's prophecy, and interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar's dream; in the explanation of which we shall follow the best commentators on the subject, but, at the same time, shall not regard any commentator so much as the truth of history, the evidence of reason, and the analogy of scripture.

"This image's head was of fine gold," (Daniel ii. 32,) which the prophet thus interprets: "Thou art this head of gold;" ver. 38. Thou, and thy family, and thy representatives. The Babylonian, therefore, was the first of these kingdoms; and it was fitly represented by "the head of fine gold," on account of its great riches; and Babylon, for the same reason, was called by Isaiah, "the golden city." Isaiah xiv. 4.

Daniel's interpretation of Nebu-
chadnezzar's
dream.

Daniel addresseth Nebuchadnezzar as a very powerful king: "Thou, O king, art a king of kings;" ver. 37. Nebuchadnezzar might, perhaps, think, like some of his predecessors, that his conquests were owing to his own fortitude and prudence; but the prophet assures him his successes must be primarily imputed to the God of heaven; "For the God of heaven (saith he) hath given thee a kingdom, power, and strength, and glory."

Though almost all the ancient eastern histories are lost, yet there are some fragments preserved, which speak of this mighty conqueror and his extended empire. Berossus saith, that he held in subjection Egypt, Syria, Phœnicia, and Arabia; and, by his exploits, surpassed all the Chaldeans and Babylonians who reigned before him. Josephus subjoins, that, in the archives of the Phœnicians, there are written things consonant to those which are said by Berossus concerning Nebuchadnezzar, namely, that he subdued Syria and all Phœnicia. Megasthenes, in the fourth book of his Indian History, endeavours to show throughout, that Nebuchadnezzar exceeded Hercules in fortitude and greatness of exploits; and positively affirms, that he subdued the greatest part of Lybia and Spain. Strabo likewise asserts, that this king, among the Chaldeans, was more celebrated than Hercules, and led his army out of Spain into Thrace and Pontus. But his empire, though of great extent, was yet of no long duration, for it ended in his grandson Belshazzar, not seventy years after the delivery of this prophecy: and this may be the reason of Daniel's speaking of him as the only king; "thou art this head of gold, and after thee shall rise, &c." Dan. ii. 38, 39.

power of king Nebuchadnezzar.

"His breast and his arms of silver," which Daniel thus interprets: "And after thee shall rise another" ther

"ther kingdom inferior to thee." It is very well known that the kingdom which arose after the Babylonian was the Medo-Perfian. The two hands and the shoulders signify that the empire of the Babylonians should be dissolved by two kings. The two kings were, the kings of the Medes and Persians, whose powers were united under Cyrus, who besieged and took Babylon, put an end to that empire, and on its ruins erected the Medo-Perfian, or the Perfian, (as it is more usually called,) the Persians having soon gained the ascendancy over the Medes.

The Perfian empire inferior to the Babylonian.

The Perfian empire is said to be inferior, as being less than the Babylonian; and it is certain that neither Cyrus, or any of his successors, ever carried their arms into Africa or Spain, at least as far as Nebuchadnezzar is reported to have done. The Perfian empire may likewise be called inferior as being worse than the former; for (as Dean Prideaux justly observes) the kings of Persia were certainly "the worst race of men that ever governed an empire." This empire, from its first establishment by Cyrus, to the death of the last king, Darius Codomanus, lasted not much above two hundred years. And thus far it is agreed by all commentators, that the two first kingdoms represented in Nebuchadnezzar's dream were the Babylonian and the Perfian.

"His belly and his thighs of brass;" which is interpreted by Daniel; "And another third kingdom of brass which shall bear rule over all the earth." It is well known that Alexander the Great subverted the Perfian empire. The kingdom, therefore, which succeeded to the Perfian was the Macedonian; and this kingdom was firstly represented by brass, for the Greeks were famous for their brazen armour, their usual epithet being "the brazen coated Greeks." The third kingdom is also said to "bear rule over all the earth." Alexander the Great commanded that he should be called "the king of all the world;" not that he really conquered, or nearly conquered, the whole world, but he had considerable dominions in Europe, Asia and Africa, that is, in all the three parts of the world then known; and Diodorus Siculus, and other historians, mention ambassadors coming from almost all parts of the world to congratulate Alexander upon his successes, or to submit to his empire.

That this third kingdom, therefore, was the Macedonian there is not the least doubt. St. Jerome saith expressly, the third kingdom signifies Alexander, and the kingdom of the Macedonians, and of the successors of Alexander; which is rightly named brazen, saith he; for, among all metals, brass is most vocal, and tinkles louder, and its sound is diffused far and wide, that it portended not only the fame and power of the kingdom, but also the eloquence of the Greek language." After the death of Alexander, the kingdoms of the east were divided among his successors; but the whole still retained the name of the Macedonian empire; and Justin reckons Alexander the same to the Macedonians, as Cyrus was to the Persians, and Romulus to the Romans.

"His legs of iron, his feet part of iron, and part of clay." This is interpreted by Daniel as follows: "And the fourth kingdom shall be strong as iron; forasmuch as iron breaketh in pieces, and subdueth all things; and as iron that breaketh all these, shall it break in pieces and bruise. And whereas thou sawest the feet and toes, part of potter's clay, and part of iron; the kingdom shall be divided; but there shall be in it of the strength of the iron, forasmuch as thou sawest the iron mixed with miry clay. And as the toes of the feet were part of iron, and part of clay; so the kingdom shall be partly strong and partly broken. And whereas thou sawest iron mixed with miry clay, they shall mingle themselves with the seed of men; but they shall not cleave one to another, even as iron is not mixed with clay." Dan. ii. 40, &c.

This fourth kingdom is described as stronger than the three preceding. As iron breaketh and bruise all other metals, so this was to break and subdue all the former kingdoms. The metal here is different, and consequently the nation was to be different from the preceding. The four different metals must signify the four different nations; and as the gold signified the Babylonians, the silver the Persians, and the brass the Macedonians, so the iron must necessarily denote some other nation; and that this nation was no other than that of the Romans, will evidently appear from what follows.

The Romans succeeded next to the Macedonians, and therefore, in course, were next to be mentioned. The Roman empire was stronger and larger than any of the preceding. The Romans brake in pieces, and subdued, all the former kingdoms. Josephus says, that, as the two arms of silver denoted the kings of the Medes and Persians, so we might say, in like manner, that the two legs of iron signified the two Roman consuls. The iron was "mixed with miry clay," and the Romans were defiled with a mixture of barbarous nations. The Roman empire was at length divided into ten lesser kingdoms, answering to the ten toes of the image. These kingdoms retained much of the old Roman strength, and manifested it upon several occasions; so that "the kingdom was partly strong and partly broken." They "mingled themselves with the seed of men." They made marriages and alliances one with another; but no hearty union ensued: reasons of state are stronger than those founded on the ties of blood, and interest will always avail more than affinity.

The Roman empire, therefore, is represented in a double state; first, with the strength of iron, conquering all before it, "his legs of iron;" and then weakened and divided by the mixture of barbarous nations, "his feet part of iron, and part of clay." It subdued Syria; and made the kingdom of the Seleucidæ a Roman province in the year 65 before Christ. It subdued Egypt, and made the kingdom of the Lagidæ a Roman province in the year 30 before Christ. And in the fourth century after Christ, it began to be torn in pieces by the incursions of the barbarous nations.

St. Jerome lived to see the incursions of the barbarous nations; and his comment is, "that the fourth kingdom, which plainly belongs to the Romans, is the iron that breaketh and subdueth all things; but his feet and toes are part of iron, and part of clay, which is most manifestly proved at this time: for as, in the beginning, nothing was stronger and harder than the Roman empire, so, in the end of things, nothing is weaker; since both in civil wars, and against divers nations, we want the assistance of other barbarous nations." He hath given the same interpretation in other parts of his works; and it seemeth that he had been blamed for it, as a reflection upon the government; and therefore he maketh this apology for himself: "If, (saith he,) in explaining the statue, and the difference of his feet and toes, I have interpreted the iron and clay of the Roman kingdom, which the scripture foretells should be first strong and then weak, let them not impute it to me, but to the prophet; for we must not so flatter princes, as to neglect the verity of the holy scriptures; nor is a general disputation an injury to a single person."

All ancient writers, both Jewish and Christian, agree with St. Jerome in explaining the fourth kingdom to be the Roman. The celebrated Mr. Mede, who was as able a judge as any person whatever in these matters, has made the following very just observation: "The Roman empire (says he) was believed to be the fourth kingdom of Daniel, by the church of Israel, both before and in Our Saviour's time; received by the disciples of the prophets, and the whole Christian church, for the first 300 years, without any known contradiction. And I confess, having so good a ground in scripture, it is with me "little less than an article of faith."

Exclusive of this wonderful image, Nebuchadnezzar saw, in his dream, "a stone cut out without hands, which smote the image upon his feet that were

“were of iron and clay, and broke them to pieces:
“then was the iron, the clay, the brass, the silver “and the gold broken in pieces together, and be“came like the chaff of the threshing-floors, and “the wind carried them away, that no place was “found for them; and the stone that smote the “image became a great mountain, and filled the “whole earth:” which is thus interpreted and ex“plained by Daniel: “And in the days of these kings “shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which “shall never be destroyed; and the kingdom shall “not be left to other people, but it shall break in “pieces, and consume all these kingdoms, and it “shall stand for ever: forasmuch as thou sawest “that the stone was cut out of the mountain with“out hands, and that it brake in pieces the iron,
“the brass, the clay, the silver and the gold;” ver.
44, 45.

By this was evidently meant the kingdom of Christ, which was set up during the days of the last of the before-mentioned kingdoms. The stone was totally a very different thing from the image, and the kingdom of Christ is totally different from the kingdoms of the world. “The stone was cut out of the mountain without hands,” and was to “a building of God, a house not made with hands.” This the fathers generally apply to Christ himself, who was miraculously born of a virgin without the concurrence of a man: but it should rather be understood of the kingdom of Christ, which was formed out of the Roman empire, not by number of hands, or strength of armies, but without human means, and the assistance of human causes. This kingdom was “set up by the God of heaven;” and from thence the phrase of “the kingdom of heaven” came to signify the coming of the Messiah; and so it was used and understood by the Jews, and so it is applied by Our Saviour in the New Testament. Other kingdoms were raised by human ambition, and worldly power; but this was the work not of man, but of God: this was truly, as it is called, “the kingdom of heaven,” and “a kingdom not of this world;” its laws, its powers, were all Divine. This kingdom was “never to be destroyed,” as the Babylonian, the Persian, and the Macedonian empires have been, and, in a great measure, also the Roman. This kingdom was to “break in pieces, and consume, all the kingdoms;” to spread and enlarge itself, so that it should comprehend within itself all the former kingdoms. In short, it was to “fill the whole earth,” to become universal, and to “stand for ever.”

As the fourth kingdom, or the Roman empire, was represented in a twofold state, first strong and flourishing, “with legs of iron,” and then weakened and divided, “with feet and toes part of iron and part of clay,” so this fifth kingdom, or the kingdom of Christ, is described likewise in two states, which Mr. Mede very justly distinguishes by the names of “the kingdom of the stone,” and “the kingdom of the mountain.” The first, when “the stone was cut out of the mountain without hands; that is, the kingdom of Christ was first set up while the Roman empire was in its full strength with “legs of iron.” The Roman empire was afterwards divided into ten lesser kingdoms, the remains of which are still subsisting. The image is still standing upon his feet and toes of iron and clay; the kingdom of Christ is still “the stone cut out of the mountain:” this stone will one day smite the image upon the feet and toes, and destroy it utterly, and will itself “become a great mountain and fill the whole earth;” or, in other words, “the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever.” Rev. xi. 15. We have, therefore, seen the kingdom of the stone, but we have not yet seen the kingdom of the mountain. Some parts of this prophecy still remain to be fulfilled; and, from the exact completion of the other parts, there is not the least doubt but that the rest, in due season, will be fully accomplished.

The interpretation of the fifth kingdom is consonant to the sense of all ancient writers, both Jews and Christians. Jonathan Bell Uzziel, who made the Chaldee Targum, or paraphrase upon the prophecies, lived a little before Our Saviour. He did not, indeed, make any Chaldee version of Daniel, but he applies his prophecies in his interpretation of those of other prophets. Thus, in a paraphrase upon Habakuk, he speaketh of the four great kingdoms of the earth, that they should, in their turns, be destroyed, and be succeeded by the kingdom of the Messiah. “For the kingdom of Babylon shall not continue, nor exercise dominion over Israel; the kings of Media shall be slain, and the strong men of Greece shall not prosper; the Romans shall be blotted out, nor collect tribute from Jerusalem. Therefore, because of the sign and redemption which thou shalt accomplish for thy Christ, and for the remnant of thy people, they who remain shall praise thee, &c.”

Josephus, in speaking of this kingdom, says, “The kingdom of the stone shall bruise the Jews that stumbled at Christ’s first coming; but the kingdom of the mountain, when manifested, shall beat the feet of the monarchial statue to dust, and leave no remains of the fourth monarchy in its last and degenerate state.”

The same opinion was prevalent among the ancient Christians, as well as among the Jews. St. Jerome, and all the fathers, who have occasion to comment upon this passage, give the same interpretation: but it will be sufficient here to preserve the testimony of that elegant historian Sulpicius Severus, who, after having given an account of Nebuchadnezzar’s dream, and all the particulars relating to it, subjoins an exposition of it agreeable to Daniel’s interpretation. “The image (says he) is an emblem of the world. The golden head is the empire of the Chaldeans; forasmuch as that was the first and most wealthy. The breast and arms of silver, signify the second kingdom, which was that of the Persians under Cyrus. In the brazen belly the third kingdom is declared to be portended, and that we see fulfilled; forasmuch as the empire, taken from the Persians, was given by Alexander to Macedonia. The iron legs are the fourth kingdom; and that is the Roman, the strongest of all the kingdoms before it. But the feet, part of iron, and part of clay, prefigure the Roman empire to be so divided as that it should never unite again; which is equally fulfilled; forasmuch as the Roman territory is occupied by foreign nations or rebels: and we see (saith he, and he lived at the beginning of the fifth century) barbarous nations mixed with our armies, cities, and provinces. But in the stone cut without hands, which brake in pieces the gold, the silver, the brass, the iron and the clay, we have a figure of Christ; for he shall reduce this world, in which are the kingdoms of the earth, to nothing, and shall establish a kingdom that will last for ever.”

Exposition
of Nebu-
chadnezzar’s dream
by Sulpicius Seve-
rus.

Thus did it please God to reveal unto Daniel, and by Daniel unto Nebuchadnezzar, the great and most signal events of this world, as Daniel said unto Nebuchadnezzar at the time he interpreted his dream; “The great God hath made known to the king what shall come to pass hereafter; and the dream is certain, and the interpretation thereof is sure.” Dan. ii. 45. The king, hearing his dream related with such exactness, might be better assured of the truth of the interpretation, and of the great events which should follow. And from hence we are enabled, in some measure, to account for Nebuchadnezzar’s prophesying a little before he died. Abydenus wrote the history of the Assyrians. It is not well known in what age he lived, and his history is lost; but there is a fragment of it preserved by Eusebius, wherein it is asserted, that Nebuchadnezzar, just before his death, was inspired, and that he prophesied in this manner: “I Nebuchadnezzar fore“tel unto you, O Babylonians, an imminent cala“mity, which neither Belus, my progenitor, nor “queen Belis can persuade the fates to avert: a Prophecy

of Nebu-
chadnezzar.

"jutor shall be a Mede, the boast of the Assyrians."

Interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar's prophecy.

This prophecy of Nebuchadnezzar was afterwards thus interpreted: Cyrus was the mule: he was born of parents of different nations; the mother the better, and the father the meaner; for she was a Mede, and a daughter of the king of the Medes; but he was a Persian, and subject to the Medes. If, therefore, any such prophecy was uttered by Nebuchadnezzar a little before his death, if any such oracle was received and believed of Cyrus and the Persians subduing Asia, it may very justly be supposed to have been derived originally from the prophecy of Daniel, which being solemnly delivered to a great king, and published in Chaldea, might come to be generally known in the east, and the truth of it soon evinced by the event that followed,

It was likewise from this prophecy of Daniel that the distinction first arose of the four great empires of the world, which hath been followed by most historians and chronologers in their distribution of times. As these four empires are the subject of this prophecy, so likewise have they been the subject of the most celebrated writers, both in former and in latter ages. The histories of these empires are the best written, and the most read, of any; they are the study of the learned, and the amusement of the polite; they are of use both in schools, and in senates: from hence, examples, instructions, laws, and politics are derived for all ages; and very little in comparison is known of other times, or of other nations.

It may be observed by some, that there have been empires as great as these, such as those of the Tartars, the Saracens, and the Turks; and it may, perhaps, be thought that they are as well deserving of a place in this succession of kingdoms, and were equally worthy to be made the objects of prophecy, being as eminent for the wisdom of their constitutions, the extent of their dominions, and the length of their duration. But these four empires had a particular relation to the church and people of God, who were subjects to each of them in their turns. The fate of them was therefore particularly predicted; and we have in them, without the intermixture of others, a line of prophecy (as it may be justly called) from the reign of Nebuchadnezzar to the full and compleat establishment of the kingdom of the Messiah.

The great arbiter of kingdoms, and governor of the universe, can reveal as much of their future revolutions as he pleaseth; and he hath revealed enough to manifest his providence, and to confirm the truth of religion. What Daniel, therefore, said on the first discovery of these things, may be very justly applied after the completion of so many particulars: "Blessed be the name of God for ever and ever; for wisdom and might are his. And he changeth the times and the seasons: he removeth kings, and setteth up kings: he giveth wisdom unto the wise, and knowledge to them that know knowledge. He revealeth the deep and secret things: he knoweth what is in the darkness, and the light dwelleth with him." Dan. ii. 20, &c.

CHAP. XII.

Of Daniel's Vision concerning the Four great Empires.

Daniel's vision concerning the four great empires.

THE last sovereign of the Babylonish empire was Belshazzar, in the first year of whose reign the same things were revealed unto Daniel concerning the four great empires of the world, as had been revealed unto Nebuchadnezzar in the second year of his reign, which was a space of about forty-eight years. All the difference between these revelations is, that what was revealed to Nebuchadnezzar in the form of a great image, was represented to Daniel in the shape of great wild beasts; which difference is accounted for by Mr. Louth, who says, "this image appeared with a glorious lustre in the imagination of Nebuchadnezzar, whose mind was wholly taken up with admiration of worldly pomp and splendor; whereas the same monarchies were represented to Daniel under the shape of fierce and wild beasts, as being the great supporters of idolatry and tyranny in the world."

In Daniel's vision the first kingdom is represented by a beast, that was "like a lion, and had eagle's wings: and I beheld till the wings thereof were pluckt, and it was lifted up from the earth, and made to stand upon the feet as a man, and a man's heart was given to it." Dan. vii. 4. This is the kingdom of the Babylonians: and the king of Babylon is, in like manner, compared to a lion by the prophet Jeremiah: "the lion is come up from his thicket, and the destroyer of the Gentiles is on his way." Jer. iv. 7. And he is said to fly as an eagle: "Behold, he shall fly as an eagle, and shall spread his wings over Moab;" xlviii. 40. And he is also compared to an eagle by the prophet Ezekiel: "Thus saith the Lord God, 'A great eagle with great wings,' &c. Ezek. xviii. 3.

The lion is the king of beasts, and the eagle the king of birds; and therefore the kingdom of Babylon, which is described as the first and noblest kingdom, and was the kingdom then in being, is said to partake of the nature of both. The eagle's wings denote its swiftness and rapidity; and the conquests of Babylon were very rapid, that empire being advanced to its height within a few years by a single person, namely, by the conduct and arms of Nebuchadnezzar. It is farther said that "the wings thereof were pluckt." Its wings were beginning to be pluckt when Daniel's prophecy was first delivered, for at that time the Medes and Persians were encroaching upon it. Belshazzar, the then reigning king, was the last of his race; and in the seventeenth year of his reign Babylon was taken, and the kingdom was transferred to the Medes and Persians.

"And it was made to stand upon the feet as a man, and a man's heart was given to it." The meaning of this passage is supposed to be an allusion to the case of Nebuchadnezzar, when, in his madness, "a beast's heart was given unto him," and, after he was restored to his senses, "a man's heart was given to him" again. It evidently appears, that, after the Babylonian empire was subverted, the people became more humane and gentle; their minds were humbled with their ill fortune; and those who vaunted as if they had been more than men, now found themselves to be but men. They were, in short, brought to such a sense as the psalmist wishes such persons to have: "Put them in fear, O Lord; that the nations may know themselves to be but men." Psal. ix. 20.

The second kingdom is represented by "another beast like to a bear, and it raised up itself on one side, and it had three ribs in the mouth of it between the teeth of it: and they said thus unto it, 'arise, devour much flesh.'" Dan. vii. 5. This is the kingdom of the Medes and Persians; and, for their cruelty and greediness after blood, they are compared to a bear, which is a savage and voracious animal. The learned Bochart recounts several particulars wherein the Persians resembled bears; but the chief likeness consisted in what has been already mentioned; and this likeness was principally intended by the prophet, as evidently appears from the words of the text itself; "Arise, devour much flesh."

"And it raised up itself on one side," or "it raised up one dominion." The Persians were subject to the Medes at the conquest of Babylon, but soon after raised themselves above them.

"And it had three ribs in the mouth of it between the teeth of it." By these are meant the three kingdoms of the Babylonians, Medes, and Persians, which were reduced into one kingdom. They might properly be called ribs, as the conquest of them much strengthened the Persian empire; and they might be said to be between "the teeth of the third kingdom," which is the kingdom of the

"the bear," as they were much grinded and oppressed by the Persians.

Natural cruelty of the Medes and Persians.

"And they said thus unto it, arise, devour much flesh." This, as we have before observed, was said to denote the natural cruelty of the Medes and Persians. They are also represented as very cruel by the prophet Isaiah, chap. xiii. 18. Cambyles, Ochus, and others of their princes, were, indeed, more like bears than men. Instances of their cruelty abound in almost all the historians who have written of their affairs. Ammianus Marcellinus describes them as being proud, cruel, and exercising the power of life and death over slaves and obscure plebeians. "They pull off the skin (says he) from men alive by pieces or altogether; and they have abominable laws, by which, for one man's offence, all the neighbourhood is destroyed."

the third kingdom.

Explanation.

The third kingdom is represented by "another beast like a leopard, which had upon the back of it four wings of a fowl: the beast had also four heads; and dominion was given to it." This is the kingdom of the Macedonians or Grecians, who, under the command of Alexander the Great, overcame the Persians, and reigned next after them: and it is fitly compared to a leopard on several accounts. The leopard is remarkable for swiftness; and Alexander and the Macedonians were amazingly swift and rapid in their conquests. The leopard is a spotted animal, and was therefore a proper emblem (according to Bochart) of the different manners of the nations which Alexander commanded, or (according to Grotius) of the various manners of Alexander himself, who was sometimes merciful, and sometimes cruel; sometimes temperate, and sometimes drunken; sometimes abstemious, and sometimes incontinent. The leopard (as Bochart observes) is of small stature, but of great courage, so as not to be afraid to engage with the lion and the largest beasts; and so Alexander, a little king in comparison, of small stature too, and with a small army, dared to attack Darius, whose kingdom extended from the Ægean Sea to the Indies.

"The beast had upon the back of it four wings of a fowl." The Babylonian empire was represented with two wings, but this is described with four. For (as St. Jerome saith) nothing could be swifter than the victories of Alexander, who ran through all the countries, from Illyricum and the Adriatic Sea, to the Indian Ocean and the river Ganges, not so much fighting as conquering; and in twelve years subjugated part of Europe, and all Asia to himself.

"The beast had also four heads;" to denote the four kingdoms into which this same third kingdom should be divided, as it was divided, after the death of Alexander, into four kingdoms, Cassander reigning over Macedon and Greece, Lysimachus over Thrace and Bithynia, Ptolemy over Egypt, and Seleucus over Syria:

"And dominion was given to it." This (as St. Jerome says) sheweth that it was not owing to the fortitude of Alexander, but proceeded from the will of the Lord. And, indeed, unless he had been directed, preserved, and assisted by the Supreme Power, how could Alexander, with 30,000 men, have overcome Darius, with 600,000, and, in so short a time, have brought all the countries, from Greece as far as to India, into subjection?

The fourth kingdom is represented by a "fourth beast, dreadful and terrible, and strong exceedingly; and it had great iron teeth: it devoured, and brake in pieces, and stamped the residue with the feet of it; and it was diverse from all the beasts that were before." Daniel was particularly desirous to know what this might mean; upon which he was thus answered by the angel, who had explained to him the former part of his vision: "The fourth beast shall be the fourth kingdom upon the earth, which shall be diverse from all kingdoms, and shall devour the whole earth, and shall tread it down, and break it in pieces." Daniel vii. 19. 23.

No. 56.

This fourth kingdom can be none other than the Roman empire. The fourth beast was so great and horrible, that it was not easy to find an adequate name for it: and the Roman empire was "dreadful, and terrible, and strong exceedingly," beyond any of the former kingdoms. It was "diverse from all kingdoms," not only in its republican form of government, but likewise in strength, and power, and greatness, length of duration, and extent of dominion. "It devoured and brake in pieces, and stamped the residue with the feet of it." It reduced Macedon into a Roman province about 168 years, the kingdom of Pergamus about 133 years, Syria about 65 years, and Egypt about 30 years, before Christ. And besides the remains of the Macedonian empire, it subdued many other provinces and kingdoms; so that it might very justly be said to "devour the whole earth, and to tread it down, and break it in pieces;" and it became, in a manner, what the Roman writers delighted to call it, namely, "The empire of the whole world."

ation.

A celebrated Greek writer, who flourished in the reign of Augustus Cæsar, hath a remarkable passage, which is very pertinent towards illustrating the fulfilment of this part of the prophecy. In speaking of the great superiority of the Roman to all former empires, he saith, "The Macedonian empire having overturned the force of the Persians, in greatness, indeed, of dominion, exceeded all the kingdoms which were before it; but yet it did not flourish a long time. After the death of Alexander it began to grow worse and worse, and being divided into several principalities by his successors, it was weakened by itself, and at last was destroyed by the Romans. Notwithstanding its once great power, yet it did not reduce all the earth and sea to its obedience. For it did not possess Africa, except that part adjoining to Egypt. Nor did it subdue all Europe; but only northwards it proceeded as far as Thrace; and westwards it descended to the Adriatic Sea. But the city of Rome ruleth over all the earth, as far as it is inhabited; and commands all the sea; not only that within the Pillars of Hercules, but also the ocean, as far as it is navigable, having first, and alone, of all the most celebrated kingdoms, made the east and west the bounds of its empire: and its dominion hath continued not a short time, but longer than that of any other city or kingdom in the world."

filment of

cy relative to the Roman empire.

Another remarkable property of this fourth beast is, that "it had ten horns:" and, according to the angel's interpretation, "the ten horns out of this kingdom are ten kings," or kingdoms, "that shall arise;" which was accordingly fulfilled when the Roman empire was divided into ten different states or kingdoms.

But, besides these ten horns or kingdoms of the fourth empire, there was to spring up among them another little horn. "I considered the horns (saith Daniel) and behold there came up among them another little horn, before whom there were three of the first horns pluckt up by the roots." Daniel was eager to know the meaning of this part of the vision; upon which the angel informed him, that as "the ten horns out of this kingdom were ten kings," or kingdoms, "that should arise," so likewise that "another shall rise after them, and he shall subdue three kings," or kingdoms.

We have already seen that the Roman empire was divided into ten horns or kingdoms, and among them we may, on a proper examination, find another little horn or kingdom, answering, in all respects, to the character here given. The celebrated Machiavel (in his history of Florence) after having shewn how the Roman empire was broken and divided by the incursions of the northern nations, says, "About this time the bishops of Rome began to take upon them, and to exercise greater authority than they had formerly done. At first the successors of St. Peter were venerable and eminent for their miracles, and the holiness of their lives; and their examples added daily such numbers to the Christian tions by

Christian church, that, to obviate or remove the confusions which were then in the world, many princes turned Christians; and the emperor of Rome being converted among the rest, and quitting Rome, to hold his residence at Constantinople, the Roman empire began to decline; but the church of Rome augmented as fast." He then proceeds to give an account how the Roman empire declined, and the power of the church of Rome increased; first under the Goths, then under the Lombards, and afterwards by calling in of the Franks.

Here, then, is a little horn springing up among the other ten horns. The bishop of Rome was respectable as a bishop long before, but he did not become an horn properly (which is an emblem of strength and power) till he became a temporal prince. He was to rise after the other, that is, behind them; so that the ten kings were not aware of the growing up of the little horn, till it had overpowered them. "Three of the first horns (that is, three of the first kings or kingdoms) were to be plucked up by the roots," and to "fall before him." These three are very fully explained both by Mr. Mede and Sir Isaac Newton; but, as there is very little variation between them, we shall only quote the words of the latter. "Kings (saith he) are put for kingdoms, and therefore the little horn is a little kingdom. It was an horn of the fourth beast, and rooted up three of his first horns, and therefore we are to look for it among the nations of the Latin empire, after the rise of the ten horns. In the eighth century, by rooting up and subduing the exarchate of Ravenna, the kingdom of the Lombards, and the senate and dukedom of Rome, the bishop acquired Peter's patrimony out of their dominions, and thereby rose up as a temporal prince or king, or horn of the fourth beast." Again. "It was certainly by the victory of the see of Rome over the Greek emperor, the king of Lombardy, and the senate of Rome, that she acquired Peter's patrimony, and rose up to her greatness."—That this explanation of Sir Isaac Newton's is justly founded will appear from what follows.

Causes of the Popes becoming temporal Princes.

First, the exarchate of Ravenna, which of right belonged to the Greek emperors, and was the capital of their dominions in Italy, having revolted at the instigation of the pope, was unjustly seized by Aistulphus, king of the Lombards, who thereupon thought of making himself master of Italy. The pope, in this exigency, applied for help to Pepin, king of France, who marched into Italy, besieged the Lombards in Pavia, and forced them to surrender the exarchate, and other territories; which were not restored to the Greek emperor, as in justice they ought to have been, but, at the solicitation of the pope, were given to St. Peter and his successors for a perpetual succession. Pope Zachary had acknowledged Pepin, usurper of the crown of France, as lawful sovereign; and now Pepin, in his turn, bestowed a principality, which was another's properly, upon Pope Stephen II. the successor of Zachary. "And so (as Platina says) the name of the exarchate, which had continued from the time of Narſes to the taking of Ravenna by Aistulphus, an hundred and seventy years, was extinguished." This (according to Sigonius) was effected in the year 755; and henceforward the popes, having become temporal princes, did no longer date their epistles and bulls by the years of the emperors reigns, but by the years of their own advancement to the papal chair.

Secondly, the kingdom of the Lombards was often troublesome to the pope. King Disiderius invaded the territories of pope Adrian I. upon which the latter was obliged to have recourse to the king of France, and earnestly invited Charles the Great, the son and successor of Pepin, to come into Italy to his assistance. He accordingly went with a great army (being ambitious also himself of enlarging his dominions in Italy) and conquered the Lombards, put an end to their kingdom, and gave great part of their dominions to the pope. He not only confirmed the former donations of his father Pepin, but also made an addition of other countries to them, as Corsica, Sardinia, the Sabine territories, the whole track between Lucca and Parma, and that part of Tuscany that belonged to the Lombards: and the tables of these donations he not only signed himself, but caused them to be signed by the bishops, abbots, and other great men then present, and laid them so signed upon the altar of St. Peter. And this was the end of the kingdom of the Lombards, in the 206th year after their possessing Italy, and in the year of Christ 774.

Thirdly, the state of Rome, though subject to the popes in things spiritual, was yet, in things temporal, governed by the senate and people, who, after their defection from the eastern emperors, still retained many of their old privileges, and elected both the western emperor and the popes. After Charles the Great had overthrown the kingdom of the Lombards, he went again to Rome, and was there, by the pope, bishops, abbots, and people of Rome, chosen Roman patrician, which is the degree of honor and power next to emperor. He then settled the affairs of Italy, and permitted the pope to hold under him the duchy of Rome with other territories: but, after a few years, the Romans, desirous to recover their liberty, conspired against pope Leo III. accused him of many great crimes, and imprisoned him. His accusers were heard on a day appointed before Charles, and a council of French and Italian bishops: but the pope, without pleading his own cause, or making any defence, was acquitted; his accusers were slain or banished, and he himself was declared superior to all human jurisdiction. And thus the foundation was laid for the absolute authority of the pope over the Romans, which was completed by degrees; and Charles, in return, was chosen emperor of the west. However, after the death of Charles the Great, the Romans again conspired against the pope; but Lewis the Pius, the son and successor of Charles, acquitted him again. Some time after this pope Leo was taken dangerously ill, which as soon as the Romans, his enemies, knew, they rose again, plundered and burnt his villas, and thence marched to Rome to recover what things had been taken from them by force; but they were repressed by some of the emperor's troops. The same emperor Lewis the Pius, at the request of pope Paschal, confirmed the donations which his father and grandfather had made to the see of Rome. Sigonius has recited the confirmation; and therein are mentioned Rome and its duchy, containing part of Tuscany and Campania, Ravenna, with the exarchate and Pentapolis, and the other part of Tuscany, and the countries taken from the Lombards: and all these are granted to the pope and his successors, that they should hold them in their own right, principality, and dominions, to the end of the world.

These were "the three horns, three of the first horns," which fell before the little horn: and the pope hath, in a manner, pointed himself out for the person by wearing the triple crown. In other respects too the pope fully answers the character of the little horn; so that if exquisite fitness of application may assure us of the true sense of the prophecy, we can no longer doubt concerning the person. He is "a little horn." And the power of the popes was originally very small, and their temporal dominions were little and inconsiderable, in comparison with others of the ten horns.

"He shall be diverse from the first:" that is, his kingdom shall be of a different nature and constitution: and the power of the pope differs greatly from that of all other princes, he having not only an ecclesiastical, but likewise a civil and temporal authority.

"And behold in this horn were eyes like the eyes of a man." This denotes his cunning and foresight; his looking out and watching all opportunities to promote his own interests: And the policy of the Roman hierarchy had almost passed into a proverb.

"He

"He had a mouth speaking very great things." And who hath been more noisy and blustering than the pope, especially in former ages, boasting of his supremacy, thundering out his bulls and anathemas, excommunicating princes, and absolving subjects from their allegiance?

"His look was more stout than his fellows." And the pope assumes a superiority, not only over his fellow bishops, but even over crowned heads; and requires greater honours to be paid to him, than are expected even by kings and emperors themselves.

"And he shall speak great words against the Most High; or, he shall speak great words as the Most High." And has he not set himself up above all laws, divine and human; arrogating to himself godlike attributes, and titles of holiness and infallibility; exacting obedience to his ordinances and decrees, in preference to, and in open violation of, both reason and scripture?

"And he shall wear out the saints of the Most High." This he has done by wars, massacres, and inquisitions, persecuting and destroying the faithful servants of Christ, and the true worshippers of God, who have protested against his innovations, and refused to comply with the idolatry practised in the church of Rome.

"And he shall think to change times and laws." This he has done by appointing fairs and feasts, canonizing saints, granting pardon and indulgences for sins, instituting new modes of worship, imposing new articles of faith, enjoining new rules of practice, and, in short, reversing, at pleasure, the laws both of God and man.

Such is the power of the pope even at this present period; and such is the little horn that was to arise out of the ten horns, or kingdoms, into which the Roman empire was divided.

But the four kingdoms represented in Daniel's vision, were to be followed by a fifth, namely, the kingdom of the Messiah. "I beheld (saith Daniel) till the thrones were cast down, and the antient of days did sit, whose garment was white as snow, and the hair of his head like the pure wool; his throne was like the fiery flame, and his wheels as burning fire. A fiery stream issued and came forth from before him; thousand thousands ministered unto him: and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him: the judgment was set, and the books were opened." Dan. vii. 9, 10. These metaphors and figures are taken from the solemnities of earthly judicatories, and particularly of the great Sanhedrim of the Jews, where the father of the consistory sat, with his assessors seated on each side of him, in the form of a semicircle, and the people standing before him: and from this was taken the description of the day of judgment as given in the New Testament.

"I beheld then, because of the voice of the great words which the horn spoke; I beheld, even till the beast was slain, and his body destroyed, and given to the burning flame," ver. 11. The beast will be destroyed "because of the great words which the horn spoke," and the destruction of the beast will also be the destruction of the horn; and consequently the horn is a part of the fourth beast, or of the Roman empire. "As concerning the rest of the beasts, they had their dominion taken away, yet their lives were prolonged for a season and a time." When the dominion was taken away from the other beasts, their bodies were not destroyed, for they were suffered to continue still in being: but when the dominion shall be taken away from the fourth beast, his body shall be totally destroyed: The other kingdoms succeeded each other, but none other earthly kingdom shall succeed to this.

"I saw in the night visions, and behold, one like the Son of Man, came in the clouds of heaven, and came to the antient of days, and they brought him near before him." Here was evidently displayed the coming of the Messiah. From hence "the Son of Man" came to be a known term for Messiah among the Jews. From hence it was taken and used to frequently in the gospel. Our Saviour intimates himself to be this very Son of Man: "Hereafter (says he) shall ye see the Son of Man sitting at the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven." Matt. xxvi. 64, 65. And for saying this, he was charged by the high-priest with having "spoken blasphemy."

"And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages should serve him: his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed." Dan. vii. 14. All these kingdoms shall, in time, be destroyed, but the kingdom of the Messiah shall stand for ever. And it was an allusion to this part of the prophecy that the angel said of Christ before he was born, "He shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end." Luke i. 33.

In what manner these great changes will be effected we cannot pretend to say, as God hath not been pleased to reveal it unto us. We see, however, the remains of the ten horns which arose out of the Roman empire. We see the little horn still subsisting, but, it is to be hoped, on the decline, and tending towards a dissolution. And having seen so many of these particulars accomplished, we can have no reason to doubt but that the rest also will, in due season, be amply fulfilled.

If we compare the prophecies of Daniel in interpreting Nebuchadnezzar's dream, with those revealed to Daniel in his vision, and interpreted by the angel, we shall find such a close similarity as must naturally strike us with astonishment. What was represented to Nebuchadnezzar in the form of a "great image," was represented again to Daniel by "four great wild beasts:" and the beasts have degenerated as the metals grew worse and worse.

Agreement between the prophecies of Daniel in interpreting Nebuchadnezzar's dream, and those revealed to him in his vision.

"This image's head was of fine gold;" and "the first beast was like a lion with eagle's wings;" and these answer to each other; and both represented the powers then reigning, or the kingdom of the Babylonians: but it appeared in splendor and glory to Nebuchadnezzar, as it was then in its flourishing condition: the plucking of its wings, and its humiliation, were shown to Daniel, as it was then drawing near to its fatal end.

"The breast and arms of silver, and the second beast like a bear," were designed to represent the second kingdom, or that of the Medes and Persians. The "two arms" are supposed to denote the two people: but some farther particulars were hinted to Daniel, of the one people rising up above the other people, and of the conquest of three additional kingdoms. To Nebuchadnezzar this kingdom was called inferior, or worse than the former; and to Daniel it was described as very cruel; "Arise, devour much flesh."

The third kingdom, or that of the Macedonians, was represented by "the belly and thighs of brass," and by "the third beast like a leopard, with four wings of a fowl." It was said to Nebuchadnezzar, that "it should bear rule over all the earth;" and in Daniel's vision, "dominion was given to it." The "four heads" signify Alexander's four successors: but the "two thighs" can only signify the two principal of them, namely, the Seleucidæ and Lagidæ, that is, the Syrian and Egyptian kings,

"The legs of iron," and "the fourth beast with great iron teeth;" exactly correspond; and as "iron breaketh in pieces" all other metals, so the fourth beast "devoured and break in pieces;" and they were, therefore, both equally proper representatives of the fourth kingdom, or the Roman, which was stronger and more powerful than either of the former kingdoms. The "ten toes" too, and the "ten horns," were alike fit emblems of the ten kingdoms, doms, which arose out of the division of the Roman empire: but all that relates to "the little horn" was revealed only to Daniel, as a person more immediately interested in the fate of the church.

The stone, that was "cut out of the mountain without hands, and became" itself "a mountain, and filled the whole earth," is explained to be a kingdom, which shall prevail over all other kingdoms, and become universal and everlasting. In like manner, "one like the Son of Man came to the antient of days," and was advanced to a kingdom, which shall prevail likewise over all other kingdoms, and become universal and everlasting.

Such is the great concord and agreement between these prophecies of Daniel; which, remarkable as they are in many things, are not more so, than that they comprehend such distant events, and extend through so many ages, from the reign of the Babylonians, to the consummation of all things. They are truly (as Mr. Mede calls them), "the sacred calendar and great almanac of prophecy; a prophetic chronology of times, measured by the succession of four principal kingdoms, from the beginning of the captivity of Israel, until the mystery of God shall be finished."

Daniel was "much troubled, and his countenance changed in him," at the foresight of the calamities that were to be brought on the church by the little horn: "he kept the matter in his heart." Much more may good men be grieved at the sight of these calamities, and lament the prevalence of popery and wickedness in the world: but let them "keep it in their hearts," that a time of just retribution will certainly come. The proof of this may be drawn from the moral attributes of God, as well as from his promise: "The judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion, to consume and to destroy it unto the end. And the kingdom, and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdoms under the whole heaven shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominion shall serve and obey him." Daniel vii. 26, 27.

CHAP. XIII.

The Vision of the prophet Daniel, relative to the Ram and He-Goat.

THE first vision Daniel had was that of the four great beasts, representing the four great empires of the world, and which happened in the first year of Belshazzar, king of Babylon. In the third year of the same king's reign he had another vision, which, though in form of a different nature, pertained, in a very great degree, to the same tendency. "In the third year of the reign of king Belshazzar, a vision appeared unto me, even unto me, Daniel, after that which appeared unto me at the first." It was exhibited to him at the palace of Shushan, and by the side of the river Ulai, or Euleus, as it is called by the Greeks and Romans. "And I saw in a vision, and it came to pass when I saw, that I was at Shushan in the palace which is in the province of Elam; and I saw in a vision, and I was by the river Ulai." Such was the time and place of the vision; and the vision itself consisted of a ram and an he-goat.

In the former vision there appeared four beasts, because four empires were there represented; but here are only two, because here we have a representation of what was transacted chiefly within two empires. The first of the four empires (that is, the Babylonian) is here wholly omitted; for its fate, at this time, was sufficiently known, and it was now drawing very near to a conclusion. The second empire, therefore, in the former vision, is the first in this; and what was there compared to a bear, is here prefigured by a ram. "Then I lifted up mine eyes, and saw, and behold, there stood before the

"river a ram which had two horns, and the two horns were high; but one was higher than the other, and the higher came up last." Dan. viii. 3. This ram with two horns, according to the explanation of the angel Gabriel, was the empire of the Medes and Persians. "The ram which thou sawest having two horns, are the kings (or kingdoms) of Media and Persia," ver. 20.

This empire, therefore, which was formed by the conjunction of the Medes and Persians, and is often called the Medo-Persian, was not unfitly represented by a ram "with two horns." Cyrus, the founder of this empire, succeeded to both crowns, and united the kingdoms of Media and Persia. It was a coalition of two very formidable powers, and therefore it is said, that "the two horns were high: but one," it is added, "was higher than the other, and the higher came up last." The kingdom of Media was the more ancient of the two, and more famous in history. Persia was of little note or account till the time of Cyrus; but under him the Persians gained and preserved the ascendancy.

The great exploits of the ram are afterwards recapitulated by the prophet, who says, "I saw the ram pushing westward, and northward, and southward, so that no beasts might stand before him, neither was there any that could deliver out of his hand, but he did according to his will, and became great." Dan. viii. 4. Under Cyrus himself the Persians pushed their conquests westward as far as the Ægean Sea and the bounds of Asia: northward they subdued the Armenians, Cappadocians, and various other nations; and southward they conquered Egypt; if not under Cyrus, yet most certainly under his son Cambyses. In the prophecy there is not any mention made of their conquests in the east, the reason of which is, that these countries lay very remote, and were of little concern or consequence to them.

The ram was strong and powerful, "so that no beasts might stand before him, neither was there any that could deliver out of his hand;" that is, none of the neighbouring kingdoms were able to contend with the Persians, but all fell under their dominion. "He did according to his will, and became great:" and the Persian empire was increased and enlarged to such a degree, that it extended "from India even unto Ethiopia, over an hundred and seven and twenty provinces." Esther i. 1. So that seven provinces were added to the hundred and twenty which it contained in the time of Cyrus. Dan. vi. 1.

After the ram appears the he-goat. "And as I was considering (saith Daniel) behold, an he-goat came from the west on the face of the whole earth, and touched not the ground: and the goat had a notable horn between his eyes;" which is thus interpreted by the angel Gabriel: "The rough goat is the king of Grecia, and the great horn that is between his eyes is the first king," or kingdom. A goat is very properly made the type of the Grecian or Macedonian empire, because the Macedonians at first, about two hundred years before Daniel, were denominated Ægeads, or "the goat's people;" and the reason of their being so called, is thus accounted for by heathen authors. Caranus, their first king, going with a great multitude of Greeks to seek new habitations in Macedonia, was commanded by the oracle to take the goats for his guides to empire; and afterwards seeing an herd of goats flying from a violent storm, he followed them to Edessa, and there fixed the seat of his empire; made the goats his ensign, or standards, and called the city Ægeæ, or "the goat's town;" and the people Ægeads, or "the goat's people." To this it may be added, that the city Ægeæ was the usual burial-place of the Macedonian kings; and it is also very remarkable, that Alexander's son by Roxana was named Alexander Ægeus, or "the son of the goat;" and some of Alexander's successors are represented in their coins with "goat's horns."

This he-goat "came from the west on the face of the whole earth;" that is, he carried every thing before

Daniel's vision of the ram and he-goat.

The time and place of the vision.

before him in all the three parts of the then known world. "And he touched not the ground:" his marches were so swift, and his conquests so rapid, that he might be said, in a manner, to pass over the ground without touching it. For the same reason the same empire, in the former vision, was likened to a leopard, which is a very swift and active animal; and, to denote the greater quickness and impetuosity, to "a leopard with four wings."

"And the goat had a notable horn between his eyes." This horn, saith the angel, "is the first king," or kingdom of the Greeks in Asia, which was erected by Alexander the Great, and continued for some years under his brother Philip Arrideus, and his two sons, Alexander Aëgus and Hercules. Dean Prideaux, in speaking of the swiftness of Alexander's marches, hath a passage which is very pertinent to our present purpose: "He flew (says he) with victory swifter than others can travel, often with his horse pursuing his enemies upon the spur whole days and nights, and sometimes making long marches for several days one after the other, as once he did in pursuit of Darius, going near forty miles a day for eleven days together; so that, by the speed of his marches, he came upon the enemy before they were aware of him, and conquered them before they could be in a posture to resist him. This exactly agreeth with the description given of him in the prophecies of Daniel some ages before, he being in them set forth under the similitude of a panther, or leopard, with four wings: for he was impetuous and fierce in his warlike expeditions, as a panther after his prey; and came on upon his enemies with that speed as if he flew with a double pair of wings. And to this purpose he is, in another part of those prophecies, compared to an he-goat, coming from the west with that swiftness upon the king of Media and Persia, that he seemed as if his feet did not touch the ground. And his actions, as well in this comparison as the former, fully verified the prophecy."

In the next part of this vision we have an account of the Persian empire being overthrown by the Grecians. "And he came to the ram that had two horns, which I had seen standing before the river, and ran unto him in the fury of his power. And I saw him come close unto the ram, and he was moved with choler against him, and smote the ram, and brake his two horns; and there was no power in the ram to stand before him, but he cast him down to the ground, and stamped upon him; and there was none that could deliver the ram out of his hand." Dan. viii. 6, 7.

The ram had before pushed westward, and the Persians, in the reigns of Darius Hystaspis and Xerxes, had poured down with great armies into Greece; but now the Grecians, in return, carried their arms into Asia, and the he-goat invaded the ram that had invaded him.

"And he came to the ram that had two horns, which I had seen standing before the river, and ran unto him in the fury of his power." These words strongly point out to our imagination the army of Darius standing and guarding the river Granicus, and that of Alexander's on the other side plunging in, swimming across the stream, and rushing on the enemy with all the fire and fury that can be conceived. It appeared to be a strange mad attempt of Alexander to attack the army of Darius, which was considerably more than five times the number of his own; but he was successful in the undertaking, and this success diffused a terror of his name, and opened his way to the conquest of Asia.

"And I saw him come close unto the ram." He had several close engagements, or set battles, with the king of Persia, and particularly at the river Granicus, in Phrygia; at the Straits of Issus, in Cilicia; and in the plains of Arbela, in Assyria.

"And he was moved with choler against him." That was for the cruelties which the Persians had exercised towards the Grecians, and for Darius's attempting to corrupt sometimes the soldiers of Alexander to betray him, and sometimes his friends to destroy him; so that he would not listen to the most advantageous offers of peace, but he determined to pursue the Persian king till he completed his destruction.

"And he smote the ram, and brake his two horns." He subdued Persia and Media, with the other provinces and kingdoms of the Persian empire; and it is remarkable that in Persia he barbarously sacked and burned the royal city of Persopolis, the capital of the empire; and in Media Darius was seized, and made a prisoner, by some of his own traitor subjects, who not long afterwards barely murdered him.

"And there was no power in the ram to stand before him, but he cast him down to the ground, and stamped upon him." He conquered where ever he went, routed all the forces, took all the cities and castles, and entirely subverted and ruined the Persian empire.

The Persian empire totally ruined

"And there was none that could deliver the ram out of his hand." Not even the numerous armies of the king of Persia could defend him; though his forces at the battle of Issus amounted to 600,000 men, and at that of Arbela to 10 or 1,100,000; whereas the whole number of Alexander's was not more than 40,000 in either battle. So true is the observation of the psalmist, "there is no king saved by the multitude of an host." Psal. xxxiii. 16.

There is not any thing fixed and stable in human affairs; and the empire of the goat, though exceeding great, was, perhaps, for that reason, the sooner broken in pieces. "Therefore the he-goat waxed very great, and when he was strong, the great horn was broken; and for it came up four notable ones, towards the four winds of heaven." Which the angel thus interprets: "Now that being broken, whereas four stood up for it, four kingdoms shall stand up out of the nation, but not in his power." Dan. viii. 22.

The empire of the goat was in its full strength when Alexander died at Babylon. He was succeeded on the throne by his natural brother, Philip Arrideus, and by his own two sons, Alexander Aëgus and Hercules; but, in the space of about fifteen years, they were all murdered; and then the first horn, or kingdom, was entirely broken. The royal family being thus extinct, the governors of provinces, who had usurped the power, assumed the title of kings; and, by the defeat and death of Antigonus, they were reduced to four, namely, Cassander, Lysimachus, Ptolemy, and Seleucus, who parted Alexander's dominions between them, and divided and settled them into four kingdoms. These four kingdoms are the "notable horns" which came up in the room of the first great horn, and are the same as the "four heads of the leopard" in the former vision.

Death of Alexander, and untimely ends of his successors.

"Four kingdoms shall stand up out of the nation, but not in his power. They were to be kingdoms of Greeks, not of Alexander's own family, but only of his nation; and neither were they to be equal to him in power and dominion, as an empire united is certainly more powerful than an empire divided, and the whole is greater than any of the parts. They were likewise to extend toward the four winds of heaven;" and, in the partition of the empire, Cassander held Macedon, and Greece, and the western parts; Lysimachus had Thrace, Bithynia, and the northern regions; Ptolemy possessed Egypt, and the southern countries; and Seleucus obtained Syria, and the eastern provinces. Thus were they divided "toward the four winds of heaven."

As, in the former vision, a little horn sprang up among the ten horns of the Roman empire, so here a little horn is described as rising among the four horns of the Grecian empire: "And out of one of them came forth a little horn, which waxed exceeding great, toward the south, and toward the east,"

"east, and toward the pleasant land." Dan. viii. 9. This little horn can only be applied to the Romans, who were a new and different power; who rose from small beginnings to an exceeding great empire; who first subdued Macedon and Greece, the capital kingdoms of the goat, and from thence spread and enlarged their conquests over the rest. When they first got footing in Greece, then they became a horn of the goat. Out of this horn they came, and were, at first, a little horn; but, in process of time, they overtopped the other horns, and became predominant. The strength of the other kingdoms consisted in themselves, and had their foundations in some part of the goat; but the Roman empire, as a horn or kingdom of the goat, was not mighty by its own power, was not strong by virtue of the goat, but drew its nourishment and strength from Rome to Italy. There grew the trunk and body of the tree, though the branches extended over Greece, Asia, Syria, and Egypt.

The remainder of this prophecy chiefly relates to the persecuting and oppressing the people of God. "And he waxed great even to the host of heaven, (or against the host of heaven,) and he cast down some of the host and of the stars to the ground, and stamped upon them:" that is, the Jewish state in general, or the priests and Levites in particular, who are called stars, from their being eminent for their station, and illustrious for their knowledge; and "the host of heaven," as they watched and served in the temple, and their service is denominated a warfare. Numb. viii. 24.

"He shall destroy wonderfully, and shall prosper, and practise, and shall destroy the mighty and the holy people; and through his policy he shall cause craft to prosper in his hand." When the city of Jerusalem was besieged and taken by the Romans, the number of captives amounted to ninety-seven thousand, and of the slain to eleven hundred thousand. The Romans too carried their conquest and revenge so as to put an end to the government of the Jews, and entirely to take away their place and nation.

The number of the slain and taken prisoners at the siege of Jerusalem.

It is farther added, that "he shall also stand up against the prince of princes." By the "prince of princes" is undoubtedly meant the Messiah. It was by the malice of the Jews, and the authority of the Romans, that he was put to death; and he suffered the punishment of the Roman malefactors and slaves. The Romans not only crucified Our Saviour, but also persecuted his disciples for above three centuries: and when, at length, they embraced the Christian religion, they soon corrupted it; so that it may be questioned whether their favour was not as hurtful to the church as their enmity. As the power of the Roman emperors declined, that of the Roman pontiffs increased: and may it not, with equal truth and justice, be said of the latter, as of the former, that they "cast down the truth to the ground, and practised, and prospered?" The persecuting power of Rome, whether exercised towards the Jews, or towards the Christians, or by the emperors or popes, is still "the little horn." The tyranny is the same; but, as exerted in Greece and the east, it is the little horn of the he-goat, or third empire; as exerted in Italy, and the west, it is the little horn of the fourth beast, or fourth empire.

But the little horn, like other tyrannical powers, was to come to a remarkable end: "he shall be broken without hand." As the stone in Nebuchadnezzar's dream was "cut out of the mountain without hands," that is, not by human, but by supernatural means, so the little horn "shall be broken without hand;" that is, not fall by the hands of man, but perish by a stroke from heaven. And this agrees perfectly with the former predictions of the fatal catastrophe of the Romans. "The stone (that is, the power of Christ) smote the image upon his feet of iron and clay, and brake them to pieces." Dan. ii. 34. "I beheld then, because of the voice of the great words which the horn spake; I beheld even till the beast was slain, and his body destroyed, and given to the burning flame." Dan. vii. 11. And again, "the judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion, to consume, and to destroy it unto the end;" ver. 26. All which implies that the dominion of the Romans shall finally be destroyed with some extraordinary manifestations of the Divine power.

Daniel was much affected with the misfortunes and afflictions which were to befall the church and people of God. "And I Daniel fainted and was sick certain days; afterward I rose up, and did the king's business, and was astonished at the vision, but none understood it." Dan. viii. 27. That Daniel was thus affected, can only be ascribed to his foreseeing that the future distress and misery of the Jews would greatly exceed all they had before sustained. And, indeed, the calamities which they suffered under the Romans were much greater than the evils brought on them by Nebuchadnezzar. But they expect, and we expect, that, at length, "the sanctuary will be cleaned," and that God's promise will, in time, be fully accomplished. "I will return, and will build again the tabernacle of David, which is fallen down; and I will build again the ruins thereof, and I will set it up: that the residue of men might seek after the Lord, and all the Gentiles upon whom my name is called, shall the Lord, who doeth all these things." Acts xv. 16, 17.

This concern of Daniel, and affection for his religion and country, show him in a very amiable light, and give an additional lustre to his character. But not only in this instance, but in every other, he manifests the same public spirit, and appears no less eminently a patriot than a prophet. Though he was torn early from his country, and enjoyed all the advantages that he could enjoy from foreign service, yet there was not any thing that could make him forget his native home: and in the next chapter (chap. ix.) we see him pouring out his soul in prayer, and most earnestly and devoutly supplicating for the pardon and restoration of his captive nation.

It is, therefore, a gross mistake, to think that religion will ever extinguish or abate our love for our own country. The scriptures, which rather excite and encourage it, exhibit several illustrious examples of it, and recommend and enforce this well as all other moral and social virtues; and especially when the interests of true religion, and of our country, are so blended and interwoven, that they cannot well be separated the one from the other. This is a double incentive to the love of our country; and, with the same zeal that every pious Jew might say formerly, every honest Christian may say now, with the royal psalmist, "O pray for the peace of Jerusalem; they shall prosper that love thee. Peace be within thy walls, and plenteousness within thy palaces. For my brethren and companion's sake I will wish thee prosperity: Yea, because of the house of the Lord our God I will seek to do thee good." Psal. cxxii. 6, &c.

CHAP. XIV.

Of the Prophecy of Moses concerning a Prophet like unto himself.

WE have already given an account of the prophecies of Moses relative to the Jews, and shall here subjoin that most memorable one of the great legislator concerning another prophet to be raised like unto himself.

At the time of this prediction Moses was about to leave his people, and therefore, to give them some comfort, he promises them another prophet. "The Lord thy God (says he) will raise up unto thee a prophet from the midst of thee, of thy brethren, like unto me; unto him shall ye hearken." Deut. xviii. 15. The same is repeated in the name of God: "I will raise them up a prophet from among their brethren, like unto thee, and will put my words into his mouth, and he shall speak unto them all that I shall command him;" ver. 18. It is likewife farther added, in the next verse, "And it shall come to pass, that whosoever will not hearken unto my words which he shall speak in my name, I will require it of you."

In order to explain the meaning of this amazing prophecy, as well as to point out the full and ample completion of it, it is necessary to consider three things.

First, who the prophet was that is here particularly meant.

Secondly, that this prophet resembled Moses in a much greater degree than any other person ever did. And,

Thirdly, that the people have been, and still are, severely punished for their infidelity and disobedience to this prophet predicted by Moses.

Who the prophet was meant by Moses.

And first, we shall consider who the prophet was that is here particularly meant. It has been the opinion of some that Joshua was the person, because he is said to have been the "successor of Moses in prophecies." Eccles. xvi. 1. And as the people were commanded to hearken unto this prophet, so they said unto Joshua, "According as we have hearkened unto Moses in all things, so will we hearken unto thee." Joshua i. 17. Some again have imagined that the prophet here meant was Jeremiah, because (say they) he frequently makes use of the words of Moses; and Ababinel, in his preface to his commentary upon Jeremiah, reckons up fourteen particulars wherein they resemble each other, and observes, that as Moses prophesied forty years, so likewise did Jeremiah.

There are others again, and those by far the much greater number, who do not imagine the prophet meant to be either Joshua or Jeremiah, or, indeed, any single person whatever, but a succession of prophets to be raised up like unto Moses; because (say they) the Jews being prohibited from going after enchanters and diviners, they could not have been effectually secured from following them, but by having true prophets of their own, whom they might consult upon particular occasions.

But, notwithstanding this difference in opinion among those who have written on the subject, yet the very favours themselves of each respective construction agree generally in this; that, though Joshua or Jeremiah, or a succession of prophets, was primarily intended, yet the main end and ultimate scope of the prophecy was the Messiah; and, indeed, there are many sufficient reasons for understanding it of him principally, if not solely, besides the preference of a literal and typical interpretation.

Joshua not the prophet meant by Moses like unto himself.

Towards the conclusion of the book of Deuteronomy, we find the following passage, which evidently refers to this prophecy, and totally refutes the notion of Joshua's being the prophet like unto Moses. "And Joshua, the son of Nun, was full of the spirit of wisdom; for Moses had laid his hands upon him; and the children of Israel hearkened unto him, and did as the Lord commanded Moses. And there arose not a prophet since in Israel like unto Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face: In all the signs and the wonders which the Lord sent him to do, &c." See Deut. xxxiv. 9, &c.

At what time, or by what hand, this addition was made to the sacred volume, cannot be certainly told; but it must have been made after the death of Moses. The expression, "there arose not a prophet since in Israel," plainly implies that this addition must have been made some time after Joshua succeeded to the government of the people, and consequently the Jewish church had no conception of a perpetual succession of the prophets to be raised up like unto Moses. And if we suppose this addition was made (as it is generally believed to have been) by Ezra, after the Babylonish captivity, then it is evident, beyond all contradiction, that neither Jeremiah, or any of the ancient prophets, were esteemed like unto Moses.

Let us consider what are the peculiar marks and characters wherein it is said that none other prophet had ever resembled Moses. "There arose not a prophet since in Israel like unto Moses." And which of the prophets ever conversed so frequently and familiarly with God? Which of them ever wrought so many and such astonishing miracles? It must be answered, that not any one of all the prophets who succeeded Moses, was ever equal or comparable to him, except the Messiah, the great Saviour and Redeemer of mankind.

It is undeniably evident, from the declaration which God was pleased to make on occasion of the sedition raised by Miriam and Aaron, that there was not to be any prophet in the Jewish church, much less a succession of prophets, like unto Moses. Miriam and Aaron grew jealous of Moses, and mutinied against him, saying, "Hath the Lord, indeed, spoken only by Moses? hath he not spoken also by us?" Numb. xii. 2. The controversy, indeed, was of such importance, that God himself was pleased to interpose, and put an end to it. "If (said he) there be a prophet among you, I the Lord will make myself known unto him in a vision, and will speak unto him in a dream. My servant Moses is not so, who is faithful in all mine house. With him will I speak mouth to mouth, even apparently, and not in dark speeches; and the similitude of the Lord shall he behold: wherefore then were ye not afraid to speak against my servant Moses."

Miriam and Aaron mutinied against Moses.

By this is clearly seen, not only the great difference which God was pleased to make between Moses and other prophets, but likewise in what respect that difference lay. God revealed himself unto other prophets in dreams and visions, but with Moses he conversed more openly, that is, "face to face." These were privileges and prerogatives of the most singular nature, and which evidently distinguished Moses from all the other prophets of the Jewish dispensation. And yet there was a prophet to be raised up like unto Moses: but who ever resembled him in those superior advantages, except the Messiah?

Difference between Moses and other prophets.

It is, moreover, implied, that this prophet should be a law-giver. "A prophet like unto thee," not simply a prophet, but a prophet like unto Moses, that is (as Eusebius explains it) a second law-giver. The reason, too, that is assigned for sending this prophet, will evince that he was to be vested with this character. The people had requested that the Divine laws might not be delivered to them in so terrible and awful a manner as they were in Horeb. God was pleased to approve of their request, and therefore promised that he would raise up unto them a prophet like unto Moses, a law-giver, who should speak unto them his commands in a familiar and gentle way. The prophet, therefore, here meant, was to be a law-giver: but there were not any of the Jewish prophets law-givers in all the intermediate time between Moses and Christ.

Christ the prophet meant like unto Moses.

If we take a farther view of this matter, we shall find, from the most indubitable authority, that there never was any prophet, and much less a succession of prophets, whom the Jews esteemed like unto Moses, from his death to the coming of the Messiah. The highest degree of inspiration is termed by them Mosaic, and they enumerate several particulars, in which that hath the pre-eminence and advantage above all others. There was, indeed, in consequence of this prophecy, a general expectation of some extraordinary prophet to arise, which particularly prevailed about the time of Our Saviour's coming on the earth. The Jews then, as well as since, understood and applied this prophecy to the Messiah, the only prophet whom they will ever allow to be as great, or greater, than Moses.

When Our Saviour had fed five thousand men, by a miracle like that of Moses, who fed the Israelites in the wilderness, then those men said, "This is of a truth that prophet that should come into the world."

"world." John vi. 14. St. Peter and St. Stephen likewise directly apply the prophecy to him, Acts iii. 22, 23. viii. 37. and they may very well be justified for so doing; for he fully answers all the marks and characters which are here given of the prophet like unto Moses. He had immediate communication with the Deity, and God spake to him face to face, as he did to Moses. He performed signs and wonders as great, or greater, than those of Moses. "I will raise them up a prophet," saith God: and the people glorified God, saying, "That a great prophet is risen up among us." Luke viii. 16. "I will put my words in his mouth," saith God: and our Saviour saith, "I have given unto them the words which thou gavest me." John xviii. 8. "He shall speak unto them all that I shall command him," saith God: and our Saviour saith "I have not spoken of myself; but the Father which sent me, he gave me a commandment, what I should say, and what I should speak. And I know that his commandment is life everlasting: whatsoever, I speak, therefore, even as the Father said unto me, so I speak." John xii. 49, 50.

Great likeness between Moses and Christ.

Having thus clearly pointed out who the person was meant in Moses's prophecy, we are now to take some notice of the great and striking likeness between Moses and Christ, and how far the latter resembled the former in more respects than any other person ever did.

We have already given some instances wherein they resemble each other; namely, of God's speaking to both face to face, of both performing signs and wonders, of both being law-givers; and in these respects none of the ancient prophets were like unto Moses. None of them were law-givers; they only interpreted and enforced the laws of Moses. None of them performed so many and such great wonders. None of them had such clear communications with God. They all saw visions, and dreamed dreams. Moses and Christ are the only two who perfectly resembled each other in these respects. But, farther to illustrate this material part of the prophecy, we shall preserve some very curious observations on the subject made by the Rev. Dr. Jortin, in his "Remarks on Ecclesiastical History."

Observations made on the subject by Dr. Jortin.

"Moses (says he) fled from his country to escape the hands of the kings of Egypt; so did Christ when his parents went into Egypt. Afterwards, 'the Lord said to Moses in Midian, Go, return into Egypt; for all the men are dead which sought thy life,' Exod. iv. 19. so the angel of the Lord said to Joseph, in almost the same words, 'Arise, and take the young child, and go into the land of Israel; for they are dead which sought the young child's life;' Matt. ii. 20. pointing him out, as it were, for that prophet who should arise like unto Moses.

Moses refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter, chusing rather to suffer affliction: Christ refused to be made king, chusing rather to suffer affliction.

Moses, says St. Stephen, "was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians;" and Josephus says, that he was a very forward and accomplished youth, and had wisdom and knowledge beyond his years. St. Luke observes of Christ, that "he increased (betimes) in wisdom and stature, and in favour with God and man;" and his discourses in the temple with the doctors, when he was but twelve years old, were a proof of it.

Moses was not only a law-giver, a prophet, and a worker of miracles, but a king and a priest: in these offices the resemblance between Moses and Christ was singular.

Moses brought darkness over the land: the sun withdrew his light at Christ's crucifixion: and as the darkness which was spread over Egypt was followed by the destruction of their first-born, and of Pharaoh and his host, so the darkness at Christ's death was the forerunner of the destruction of the Jews.

Moses foretold the calamities which would befall that nation for their disobedience; so did Christ.

The spirit which was in Moses was conferred, in some degree, upon the seventy elders, and they prophesied: Christ conferred miraculous powers upon seventy disciples.

Moses was victorious over powerful kings and great nations; so was Christ by the effects of his religion; and by the fall of those who persecuted his church.

Moses conquered Amalec by holding up both his hands: Christ overcame his and our enemies when his hands were fastened to the cross.

Moses interceded for transgressors, and caused an atonement to be made for them, and stopped the wrath of God; so did Christ.

Moses ratified a covenant between God and the people by sprinkling them with blood: Christ with his own blood.

Moses desired to die for the people, and prayed that God would forgive them, or blot him out of his book: Christ did more, he died for sinners.

Moses instituted the passover, when a lamb was sacrificed, none of whose bones were to be broken, and whose blood protected the people from destruction: Christ was the paschal lamb.

Moses lifted up the serpent, that they who looked upon him might be healed of their mortal wounds: by properly looking up to Christ all will be healed.

All Moses's affection towards the people, all his cares and toils on their account, were repaid by them with ingratitude, murmuring, and rebellion: the same returns the Jews made to Christ for all his benefits.

Moses was ill used by his own family; his brother and sister rebelled against him: there was a time when Christ's own brethren believed not in him.

Moses had a very wicked and perverse generation committed to his care and conduct; and, to enable him to rule them, miraculous powers were given to him; and he used his utmost endeavour to make the people obedient to God, and to save them from ruin; but in vain: in the space of forty years they all fell in the wilderness except two. Christ also was given to a generation not less wicked and perverse; his instructions and miracles were lost upon them, and in about the same space of time, after they had rejected him, they were destroyed.

Moses was very meek above all men that were on the face of the earth; so was Christ.

The people could not enter into the land of promise till Moses was dead: by the death of Christ the kingdom of heaven was open to believers.

In the death of Moses and Christ there is also a resemblance of some circumstances: Moses died, in one sense, for the iniquities of the people: it was their rebellion which was the occasion of it, which drew down the displeasure of God upon them and upon him: Moses went up, in the sight of the people, to the top of mount Nebo, and there he died, when he was in perfect vigour, when "his eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated." Christ suffered for the sins of men, and was led up, in the presence of the people, to mount Calvary, where he died in the flower of his age, and when he was in his full natural strength.

Neither Moses, or Christ, as far as we can collect from sacred history, were ever sick, or felt any bodily decay or infirmity, which would have rendered them unfit for the toils they underwent; their sufferings were of another kind.

Moses was buried, and no man knew where his body lay: nor could the Jews find the body of Christ. Lastly,

Lastly, as Moses, ■ little before his death, promised "another prophet," so Christ, before his death, promised "another comforter."

Such are the comparisons made by Dr. Jortin relative to the great resemblance between Moses and Christ; but the greatest similitude consists in their both being law-givers, which no other prophets ever were. They may resemble each other in many other circumstances, and a fruitful imagination may strike upon a likeness, where, in reality, there is not any to be found. But, as the same excellent writer concludes, "Is this similitude and correspondence in so many things between Moses and Christ the effect of mere chance? Let us search all the records of universal history, and see if we can find a man who was so like to Moses as Christ was, and so like to Christ as Moses was. If we cannot find such an one, then have we found him of whom Moses, in the law, and the prophets, did write, Jesus of Nazareth the Son of God."

We come now to consider the last part of the prophecy, in doing of which, it will be no very difficult matter to prove that the people have been, and still are, severely punished for their infidelity and disobedience to this prophet.

The words in this part of the prophecy are very clear and express. "Unto him ye shall hearken: And it shall come to pass, that whosoever will not hearken unto my words which he shall speak in my name, I will require it of him." That is, I will severely punish him for it; or, as the Seventy translate it, "I will take vengeance of him."

This prophecy, as we have clearly proved, evidently relates to Christ. God himself, in a manner, applies it to him; for when he was transfigured, there came "a voice out of the cloud, which said, 'This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased; hear ye him.'" Mat. xvii. 5. This manifestly alludes to the words of Moses; "Unto him ye shall hearken;" and clearly points out that Christ alone was the prophet like unto Moses. The apostle St. Peter directly applies it to Our Saviour. For Moses truly said unto the fathers, "A prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you, of your brethren, like unto me; him shall ye hear in all things whatsoever he shall say unto you: and it shall come to pass, that every soul which will not hear that prophet, shall be destroyed from among the people." Acts iii. 22, 23.

And hath not this terrible denunciation been fully executed upon the Jews? Was not the compleat destruction of that incredulous nation (soon after Christ had finished his ministry among them, and his apostles had likewise preached in vain) the fulfilling of the threat for not hearkening unto him? We may be the more certain of this application as Our Saviour himself not only denounced the same destruction, but also foretold the signs, the manner, and the circumstances of it with the greatest exactness. Such, indeed, of those Jews who believed in his name, by remembering the caution, and following the advice which he had given them, escaped from the general ruin of their country: but the main body either perished in their infidelity, or were carried captives into other nations; and, by persisting in the same infidelity, they have ever since been a vagabond, distressed, and miserable people.

The wise dispensations of Providence are in no respect more amply displayed than in the fulfilment of this part of the prophecy. We must be blind not to see it; and seeing, we cannot but admire and adore it. What account can the Jews themselves give of their long captivity, dispersion, and misery? Their former captivity, for the punishment of their wickedness and idolatry, lasted only seventy years; but they have lived in their present dispersion, even though they have not been idolaters, upwards of seventeen hundred.

No. 56.

But though they have thus long laboured under these calamities for the enormity of their crimes, yet it is to be hoped that, upon a proper faith and repentance, they will, in time, become objects of the Divine mercy. We shall therefore conclude with the words of the apostle St. Paul; "Our hearts desire and prayer to God for Israel is, that they may be saved." Rom. x. 1.

CHAP. XV.

Of the Jewish Ritual, or Ceremonial Law.

IN the preceding chapters we have given an ample account of the respective prophecies contained in the Old Testament, the greater part of which have been already fulfilled, some art still fulfilling, and, no doubt, the rest will be fulfilled when the appointed time shall arrive. In this chapter we shall take some notice of the religious laws and ceremonies of the Jews, as also the means whereby they became acquainted with learning and literature.

Of the Jewish ritual, or ceremonial law.

The constitution of the Mosaic law consisted of three parts; namely,

Constitution of the Mosaic law.

1. Of political and judicial laws.
2. Of moral precepts, such as the ten commandments.
3. Of rites and ceremonies, such as circumcision, sacrifices, washings, purifications, the use of certain garments, &c. and divers rites by the priests in the tabernacle.

We shall observe, in general, that the design of these ceremonies was to convey religious and moral instructions to the people; and the method of their receiving these instructions was, in many instances, by hieroglyphics. Thus the government of the world by Divine Providence, and his extraordinary interposition in favour of good men, is represented by a ladder standing on the earth, and reaching to heaven, with the angels ascending and descending on it, to receive and execute orders from God above, who ruleth over all. Gen. xxviii. 12, 13. In the stile of this hieroglyphic Our Lord himself speaks: "Hereafter shall ye see heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of Man." John i. 51.

Design of the Jewish ceremonies.

The exaltation of Joseph above the rest of his family, was represented by the hieroglyphic of his sheaf standing upright, and the eleven sheaves of his brethren standing round about, and bowing to it. As also of the sun, and moon, and eleven stars, making obedience to him. Gen. xxxvii. 7, 9.

Emblems of the different tribes.

The tribe of Judah is represented by a young lion; Issachar, by a strong ass; Dan, by a serpent lurking in the road; Naphtali, by an hind; Joseph, by a fruitful bough; Benjamin, by a ravening wolf. Gen. xlix. 9, 14, &c.

A rod or staff, as it is an instrument of striking or beating down, is the hieroglyphic of power exerted in conquering, punishing, and ruling. Isa. x. 5, 24. With such a rod Moses and Aaron appeared before Pharaoh, as hieroglyphically representing the power and authority of God, in whose name they demanded the release of the Israelites. Exod. vii. 15. Thus they appeared as men of learning, and acted agreeable to the literature of the age in which they lived.

A horn represented temporal power and dominion. 1 Sam. ii. 10. Psalm lxxix. 24.

A yoke, such as slaves carried upon their shoulders, represented servitude or bondage. Gen. xxviii. 37, 40.

This may serve to explain the nature of hieroglyphics, ■ sort of language to which the Jews were accustom'd; being the learning of that age, which they could understand much better than abstract reasonings about moral truths and duties.

The rites and ceremonies of the Jews hieroglyphic.

We may therefore, on this account, well admit, that the rites and ceremonies of their religious institutions were hieroglyphic, and intended, by external representations, to give them useful instructions in true religion and real goodness.

If we consult the prophets and apostles, who were well acquainted with their meaning, we shall find so much evidence of the moral and spiritual intention of so many, as may induce us to believe this was the sense and spirit of all the rest.

The Jews were enjoined frequent and various ablutions, or washings with water; the common use of which is to discharge the body from all dirt and filth, and to keep it clean. This was ■ very easy representation of purity of mind, or of an heart purged from filth and sin. In this manner the prophets understood it: "Wash me from mine iniquity." Psal. li. 2. "Wash me, and I shall be clean; ver. 7. "Wash yourselves, make yourselves clean; put away the evil of your doings." Isaiah i. 6.

Anointing with oil, or ointment, by which the head was beautified, and the countenance exhilarated, had the signification of honour, joy, holiness, and inspiration. Psal. xlv. Acts x. 38. The priests officiated in garments of fine linen; Exod. xxxix.

27. meaning, that the priests should be clothed, or have their minds adorned with righteousness.

Burning of incense, whose smoke riseth up with a pleasant scent, was an hieroglyphic representation of acceptable prayer. Psal. cxli. 2. Luke i. 10.

Circumcision had relation to the heart and soul, or to the retrenching all inordinate affections and inclinations. Lev. xxvi. 41. Rom. ii. 29.

The sprinkling of blood, and of the water of separation, (Numb. xix. 13, 19.) was hieroglyphic, and had a moral signification. See Heb. ix. 13, 14. 1 Pet. i. 2. As had likewise the muzzled mouth of the ox; Deut. xxv. 4. compared with 1 Cor. ix. 9, 10. 1 Tim. v. 17, 18.

Some persons have indulged their fancies more than they ought, and pretended to have found more mysteries in the Hebrew ritual than were really designed; but these instances, explained by authentic evidence, may convince us, that the whole had a spiritual meaning; and as we are taught in the Gospel every thing necessary to faith and practice in the plainest manner, we need not give ourselves much trouble about discovering the meaning of the other rites, which are not explained by the prophets and apostles.

But the affair of sacrifice, so often mentioned in the Old Testament, was a type of Our Blessed Redeemer, who died for our sins, and rose again for our justification.

GEOGRAPHICAL AND DESCRIPTIVE

INDEX OF THE PRINCIPAL PLACES

MENTIONED IN THE WORKS

FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS.

Abarim. ABARIM, mentioned in Numbers xxvii. 12. was a long ridge of mountains, that reached from the tribe of Reuben into the land of Moab, on each side of the river Arnon, of which the mounts Pitgah, Peor, and Nebo (where Moses died) were a part.

Acra. ACRA, a large fortress, built by Antiochus, during the time of his persecution of the Jews, (related in the Maccabees,) out of the ruins he made of Jerusalem, on an eminence of the city of David. The word Acra properly signifies an eminence, or fortress, built on some raised ground, which has the command of the country round about; and as this of Acra stood higher than that of Simon, it gave the garrison the advantage of annoying all that passed to and from the temple. After sustaining several fortunes and revolutions, it was demolished by the victorious Simon.

Adasa. ADASA, mentioned, in the Maccabees, as the place where Judas Maccabeus pitched his camp, is said, by Jerome, to have been seated in the tribe of Ephraim.

Adibena. ADIBENA, a province of ancient Assyria. The whole country has been sometimes called by the name of this part of it.

Adida. ADIDA, the name of a fort recorded in the Maccabees, to be set up, or built, by Simon, in the region of Sephalia, westward of Elutherpolis, in Judæa.

Alexandria. ALEXANDRIA, the greatest city in Egypt, was built by Alexander the Great, on the coast of the Egyptian Sea, and in that part of Africa that is near the mouth of the Nile, where it forms a noble spacious haven, in form of a crescent. This city, as founded by Alexander, bears his name, and contains his tomb. On his building it, he brought great numbers of Jews thither to plant it; and Ptolemy Soter, after his death, having fixed the seat of his government there, was so desirous of augmenting and adorning it, that, in order to render it the metropolis of Egypt, he brought thither many of that nation for that purpose, where, having granted them free exercise of their religion, and all the same privileges with the Macedonians and other Greeks, they soon became a great part of the inhabitants of that city. We are told that Alexandria was almost entirely ruined by the Romans, after they had become masters of it: but the emperor Adrian not only repaired both the public and private buildings, and restored to the inhabitants their former privileges, but heaped new favours upon them. In the palace, which took up one third of the city, one quarter was consecrated to the muses and sciences, and thence called the Museum. There were lodged and entertained, at the public expence, men of learning, divided into societies, or colleges, according to the different sciences which they professed. They were all under one head, named by the emperor, and honoured with the title of pontiff. Among the many eminent persons whom their noble seminary produced, we may reckon Clemens Alexandrinus, Origen, and Athanasius. It was adorned with such numbers of choice books, as to form the finest library in the world, which underwent many ravages and accidents, and was frequently repaired and stored with the same number of books, till at length it was burnt by the barbarous Saracens, in making themselves masters of Alexandria. We have not space to enumerate the public edifices and ornaments of antiquity. This city, by the Romans, was named Pharos Sebaste, Augusta, Julia, Claudia, Domitia, as well as Alexandria; by the natives, Racoris: but the Turks now call it Scanderia, or Scanderic; for they abbreviate the name of Alexander into that of Scander, and thus they give the name Scanderoon to Alexandretta. Its haven, tho' not very safe, is yet much frequented. But, however magnificent, opulent, &c. this city formerly was, it is now reduced, for the most part, to such heaps of ruins, (in some places even higher than the houses that are left in it,) and such desolation reigns through every quarter, that one cannot see a single street entire. Alexandria hath two ports, the old and

and the new: into the first none but Turkish vessels are admitted; the latter receives vessels from Europe. It is, with the rest of Egypt, subject to the Grand Signior, who seems, however, to have a limited authority, being often obliged to submit the administration of government to the humours of the petty princes of Egypt.

driou.

ALEXANDRION, a fortress in Judæa, built by Alexandar Jannæus, from whom it had its name. It was situated on an high mountain, at the entrance into Judæa, near the town of Corea, which was the first place in Judæa on the Samaritan side, and upon the road to Jericho, on the frontiers of Judah and Benjamin. Alexandrion was afterwards the burying place of the Jewish kings; so that, though it was demolished by the Romans, it was rebuilt by Herod.

Amathia.

AMATHA, a city on the Jordan, built, probably, by Herod, for the benefit of the hot waters for which it was famed.

Antioch.

ANTIOCH was built by Seleucus, and soon after became, and for ages continued to be, the metropolis of the east; for not only the Syrian kings, but afterwards the Roman emperors, chose it for the usual place of their residence. It stood on the Orontes, (now called the Hasi) the place where that river empties itself into the Mediterranean, being equally distant from Constantinople and Alexandria, in Egypt. Seleucus called it from his father's name, which was Antiochus. This metropolis of Syria was afterwards known by the name of Tetrapolis, (i. e. fourfold city,) being divided, as it were, into four cities, each of them having its proper wall, besides the common one which enclosed them all. The place where it stood was very subject to earthquakes, by which it greatly suffered, and was often in danger of being overwhelmed. However, it continued 600 years, till it was taken and utterly destroyed by Bibaris, sultan of Egypt. It is now (in comparison) a small and contemptible village, known by the name of Anthakia, and remarkable for nothing but its ruins. There is one thing well worth notice with relation to the walls of this city, that, within the thickness of it, at a certain place, there is a space left open, and with a gradual and imperceptible ascent, by which loaded carts or waggons may be drawn from the bottom of the wall quite up to the castle. They were flanked with 100 square towers, strongly built, of which there is still a good number left, every one having a cistern in the middle of it, quite entire to this day. It is also famous for giving the name of Christians to the disciples of Our Blessed Saviour; for being the birth-place of St. Luke, the Evangelist; and of Theophilus, hence surnamed Antiochenus; and for its celebrated bishop, St. Ignatius the Martyr.

Antipatris

ANTIPATRIS, a city built, or rather rebuilt or repaired, by Herod, and so named in honour of his father Antipater, having been formerly called Cap-har-salama. It does not stand very far from Jerusalem, in the road to Cæsarea.

Antonia.

ANTONIA. After Simon had destroyed Mount Acra, (before described,) he built fortifications round the mountain on which the temple stood, for the better securing and fortifying it against all future insults from the heathens, within which he built an house, and dwelt there all his life-time. This house seems to be the same which Hyrcanus afterwards built into the castle Baris, where he, and all his successors of the Asmonean family, dwelt, and kept their court; and here laid up the pontifical stole, or sacred robes of the high-priest, &c. &c. which continued to be done till the time of Herod, who, on his being made king of Judæa, having observed the convenience of the place, rebuilt and made it a very strong fortress. Instead of Baris, the name it formerly bore, he called it Antonia; thereby complimenting Marcus Antonius, the triumvir, who then governed the eastern provinces of the Roman empire. The form of the building was that of a quadrangle, all built on every side, wherein were rooms for all the uses of a palace; and in the middle was a large area for the soldiers to be in; and round it was a stately piazza, or cloister. There was a turret near the middle of the north side of the great square of the temple built remarkably high, that from thence might be seen all that was done in the courts within; so that if a tumult should arise in any part of the temple, it might be observed, and soldiers sent down to quell it. When Jerusalem fell into the hands of the Romans, they continued keeping a strong garrison in it; and by reason of its immediate influence on the temple, the captain of the garrison is, in scripture, called the Captain of the Temple. This fortress was at last mastered and taken by the Romans, and destroyed in the desolation and total destruction of Jerusalem by Titus and his forces.

ARABIA, if we include all those countries which go under that general name, is of very great extent, and has been, from early times, divided into three parts, viz. Arabia Felix, or happy, to the south; so styled from its rich produce, and famous for the queen of Sheba, who came to hear the wisdom of Solomon, or whose kingdom was situated in this fertile country. Arabia Petrea, or rocky; so called not from its capital Petra, as built on a rock, but from the rockiness of the whole division, being full of mountains, among which is Mount Sinai, or Horeb, so famous in sacred scripture. As Arabia Petrea lies to the north of Arabia Felix, so still more north, or rather north-east, lies the third division, called, from its natural barrenness, Arabia Deserta. Various are the opinions of the learned concerning the origin and name of this country, and it would rather tend to perplex than entertain to specify them. As to the climate, part of Arabia is under the hottest, viz. the torrid zone. The air on the north part is extremely hot during the six summer months, the heavens being seldom or ever over-cast with clouds. But on the south side it is much more temperate, being qualified with refreshing dews, which fall almost every night in great abundance. The distinct names of the three Arabias sufficiently declare the nature of their soil; the northern being extremely barren, and encumbered with huge formidable rocks; the other over-spread with vast mountains of sand. But the southern, deservedly styled the happy, is blessed with an excellent soil, and extraordinary fertile in many places. It abounds with the rarest and most valuable commodities; as also with camels, animals of singular use for carriage, that seem formed by nature for this dry and sultry soil, which sometimes affords no water for many days travel. The country is infested with what are called freebooters, a strange species of mortals, scarcely deserving the title of human. They are all of a swarthy complexion, of mean stature, raw-boned, and very swift. Their voices are effeminate as well as their temper. They have no settled habitation, except those that live on the sea-coast, where their cities and towns are more regularly built and inhabited, as well as more given to traffic. Those of the inland country roam from place to place, sleep under tents, which they pitch at night, where their convenience or fancy leads them. As we have hitherto shewn the worst side of their character, we now ought, in justice, to shew the best; for there are, on the other hand, many of them, especially such as live in towns, that apply themselves to trade and commerce, to arts and sciences, in which they generally excel. This is particularly true with regard to the ancient Arabians, whose extraordinary performances, in physics, astronomy, and mathematics, shew them to have been men of great genius and application. They are, to this day, allowed to be very ingenious, witty, and generous, great admirers of poetry and rhetoric. The language of the three Arabias is Arabick, or corrupt Arabic, which is not only used here, but spoken, with some variations of dialect, over great part of the eastern countries. The true and ancient Arabic is a kind of dialect from the Hebrew, and esteemed, by the learned, very necessary for understanding the Old Testament. Christianity was first preached here by St. Paul, and some of his eminent disciples; so that it had received the light of the gospel from the earliest time. But in many parts it was much clouded, long before the grand impostor Mahomet, their countryman, appeared, and, upon their being subdued by the Turks, they all embraced his religion, as best suited their depraved inclinations.

ARAM. The name Aram is constantly in Scripture the name of Syria, and the Syrians are called Arameans in divers places thereof. Several authors agree that the people now called Syrians were anciently called Aramenians and Arameans. Agreeably hereto, the adjoining countries into which the posterity of Aram might spread took his name, with some other additional ones joined to it.

ARBELA, so famed in history for the battle fought near Guagamela, in its neighbourhood, which last, being but an inconsiderable village, the city Arbela was chosen by historians to give name to that celebrated fight between Darius and Alexander, which proved the decisive stroke for the Persian empire. Arbela is by some placed in Persia, but with more truth in Assyria Propria, or Adiabena. Its plain is described as being 15 leagues in extent, watered with several rivulets, and producing great variety of fine fruit-trees; and the eminences where the ancient castles stood are covered with stately oaks.

ARMENIA. Authors differ concerning the origin whence this track derived its name. It was anciently divided into the Greater and Lesser, or Armenia Major and Minor. The former was one of the greatest provinces of Asia Minor. The soil of this country is very mountainous, yet the hills are here and there interspersed with fruitful and most beautiful dales and vallies. All sorts of grain are very indifferent; and if they had not the conveniency of watering their lands, they would be almost barren. What the country produces is almost entirely owing to painful labour, being either watered actually by hand, or by dug trenches, &c. for the fecundation of the fields. The cold is so intense here, that all manner of fruits are more backward than in most of the northern countries. The hills are covered with snow the whole year round, and it sometimes falls even in the month of June. The earth of this country produces an excellent medicine, viz. that which, from the name of this territory, receives its own surname Bole Armenic, which was anciently, as well as at present, found in Armenia, and was by Galen first introduced into medicine, and used with success in the time of a terrible plague at Rome. We have no system of the laws of the Armenians, and scarcely withal to form any particular idea of them. As to their religion, we are not so much at a loss, for a writer of credit assures us, they worship the same deities with the Medes and Persians, which will be specified hereafter. We have little or no authority for their learning and arts. Their language was much the same with that of the Syrians, at least they used the Syriac characters. The modern Armenians use two languages, the learned and the vulgar, the former (as they say) having no affinity with any other oriental language. Though the modern Armenians are now perhaps the greatest traders on the earth, yet we find no mention of any commerce carried on by them in ancient times. Shah Abbas, king of Persia, is said to have been the first who, considering the œconomy and indefatigable industry of this people, put them upon trade, and settled a colony of them at Julfa, the famous suburb of Isaphan. This place contains at present above 30,000 inhabitants, all Armenians and merchants. In the reign of Justinian II. the Saracens subdued Armenia, and held it till the irruption of the Turks, who possessed themselves of this country, and called it Turcomania; but the eastern part of it is subject to the Persians at this day. Nor was the extirpation of the royal race of Armenia absolutely effected, for we find it had kings again of its own even after such conquests by Saracens, Turks, Tartars, &c. And in our own chronicles we find mention of Leo, king of Armenia, who, in the reign of Richard II. came into England to sue for and against the Turks, who had driven him from his kingdom.

Armenia Minor may be described as in most instances similar to Armenia Major, so that it may suffice to observe, that, after a variety of revolutions through a succession of æras, it was, by Vespasian, made a province of the Roman empire, and so continued till the division of the same, when it became subject to the emperors of the east; and, on the decline of their power, it was first subdued by the Persians, and afterwards by the Turks, who gave it the name of Ganech, and have held it ever since.

ARNON. The brook or torrent of Arnon ran along between the countries of the Ammonites and Moabites, and discharged itself into the Black Sea. The river Arnon is supposed to have been the first northern boundary of the Israelites on the other side of Jordan.

ASCALON, in Palestine, (or the country of the Philistines,) is a great and noble sea-port to the northward of Gaza, and known to us still by the same name it bears in Scripture, and in the writings of the ancient Greeks and Romans, by whom it was held in great veneration. This city, as well as Gaza, is reckoned into the lot or tribe of Judah, and was taken by them, but not held. Its situation cannot be disputed, since it may be said to stand at this day, and has been often visited. Ascalon was famous amongst the ancients on many accounts. It was the birth-place of Semiramis, the Assyrian empress. It is noted for the place which originally produced the kind of onion called the shalot, which is supposed from thence to have derived its name. It may seem, at first sight, to be a very oblique derivation, till it is observed that the Latin of this plant is Ascalonia, whence the French have their Eschalote, which we have curtailed into Shalot. It is also famed for its wines, and very remarkable for its great flights of pigeons. With respect to the remarkable of Ascalon, we must not forget to mention the cypresses, which were here to be admired, nor the extraordinary wells attributed to Abraham and Isaac. This city had, in the first times of Christianity, an episcopal see; and, in the course of the holy wars, it was beautified with a new wall, and many fair buildings, by our king Richard I. But it is now dwindled almost to nothing. The Turks call it Scalana; and it is of no note, except for a Turkish garrison kept in it.

ASHDOD, or Azotus, was a city of the Philistines, to the N. E. of Ascalon, and of extraordinary fame among the ancients. It stood in a country which produced great plenty of corn. Here was the temple of Dagon, and here was he peculiarly worshipped. He seems to have been the grand, the most ancient, and favourite deity they had. To him they attributed the invention of bread-corn, or of agriculture, as his very name imports, the word Dagon signifying bread-corn. This Ashdod of the Old Testament is called Azotus in the New, as well as in the book of the Maccabees. It lies near the shore, between Gaza and Joppa. In the times that Christianity flourished in these parts, it was made an episcopal see, and continued a fair village till the days of St. Jerome.

ASPHALTITIS, Lake of, or the Dead Sea, is called also the Salt Sea. Much has been said and supposed of this famous or (as most will have it) infamous lake, that nothing will sink in it; and that it rose up from the submersion of the vale of Siddim, where once, as is most generally concluded, stood the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah. On this account it has been abhorred and detested, and represented as an everlasting monument of the Divine judgment, to deter mankind from the sins committed by those who drew down on them such fierce vengeance. As to this lake's several names, it was called Asphaltitis from the quantity of bitumen in and about it. It was formerly supposed that great quantities of this combustible substance were thrown up by this sea, and travellers represent it as in great plenty on the shores of it. It exactly resembles pitch, pitch, and cannot readily be distinguished from it by the sulphureousness of its smell and taste. It is called the Dead Sea, because it produces no fish, nor sustains any thing that has life, through its excessive saline quality. It is called the Salt Sea, as being to the highest degree impregnable with salt, inasmuch that Galen supposes it, in specific gravity, to be as much beyond other sea water, as sea water is beyond the water of rivers, and that it was impossible to immerge in it. The same physician likewise observes, that the saltiness of the sea is attended with an unpleasant bitterness. All this agrees well enough with what we are told of it at present, except that bodies will immerge in it, though not so easily as in other water. This sea, in its present state, is enclosed on the east and west with exceeding high mountains; on the north, it has the Plain of Jericho, or (if we take in both sides of the Jordan) the Great Plain, properly so called; and on the south it is open, and extends beyond the reach of the eye.

B.

Babel.

BABEL. The sons of Noah, on their arrival in a plain, in the land of Shinaar, began to think of building a city and tower. Their motive to this undertaking was their apprehension of a second deluge, and to have a place sufficiently high to fly to. But this enterprize being displeasing to the Almighty, they were obliged to give over their project before they had finished it, their language being so confounded that they could not understand one another; from whence the city took the name of Babel, which signifies confusion, whereupon the dispersion and planting of nations ensued.

Babylon.

BABYLON. Some historians make queen Semiramis, and others Belus, the first founder of this renowned city. But the first of these seems most to be depended on. However, it is generally agreed, that it was vastly improved, augmented, adorned, and made the wonder of the world, by Nebuchadnezzar. The most famous works were the walls of the city, the temple of Belus, his palace, with the gardens, the banks of the river, and the artificial lake and canals, made for the draining of that river, in the magnificence and expence of which works he much exceeded whatever had been done by any king before him; and, excepting the walls of China, nothing like it hath been since attempted. A famous traveller, in his itinerary, which he wrote about the middle of the twelfth century, tells us, that he was on the spot where the city of Babylon stood, and that he saw only some ruins of Nebuchadnezzar's palace still remaining, which nobody ventured to visit by reason of the many serpents and scorpions that infested the place. Another, in the account he gives of his travels from India to Italy, tells us, that, in his time, there was scarce any thing remaining of this great and famous city, and that the place on which it stood was the least frequented of any in all that country. A third confirms the accounts of the former, observing, "that the village of Elugo stands in the place where formerly Babylon, the metropolis of Chaldea, stood; that the country is so dry and barren that it cannot be tilled; and so bare, that he should have doubted, very much, whether this potent city (which was the most famous and stately one of the world, situated in the pleasant and fruitful country of Shinaar) stood in that place, if he had not known it by its situation, and several antiquities still to be seen in that neighbourhood, particularly the old bridge, which was laid over the Euphrates, whereof there were some arches still remaining, built of burnt brick, and wonderfully strong." He adds, that, just before the village of Elugo is the hill whereon the castle stood, and that the ruins of its fortifications were still to be seen; and further, that, at a small distance from the castle stood the tower of Babylon, but so ruinous and full of venomous reptiles, that nobody dares come within half a mile of it, except in two of the winter months, when the insects keep within their holes. This shews how fully the predictions of the prophets, relating to this place, have been accomplished. It was first called Seleucia Babylonia, or Seleucia in the province of Babylon, to distinguish it from several other cities in different provinces bearing the name Seleucia. Afterwards it was known by the name of Babylonia, and at length by that of Babylon. As Babylon was drained of its inhabitants by Seleucia, so was Seleucia, in process of time, by Ctesephon and Almadaya, and these again by Bagdat. This last city was first built in the same place where Seleucia, or new Babylon, stood, which gave rise to the common error, that Bagdat stands on the ruins of old Babylon.

With respect to the Babylonian government, it was monarchical and despotic, their laws accordingly vague and uncertain, their punishments unfixed, arbitrary, and rigorous to the utmost. Their religion was rank idolatry, and some at least of their customs (even religious ones) shockingly brutal.

BAHURIM. This place is remarkable for two circumstances: the first as the place where Phaltiel, to whom Saul had given Michal, the wife of David, followed her weeping, when Ishbosheth restored her to her said first husband. The other on account of Shimei's behaviour here towards David, when he fled from his son Absalom. It appears, from the particulars mentioned as relative to these circumstances, that Bahurim was near the mount of Olives, and consequently not far from Jerusalem to the east, and situated within the tribe of Benjamin.

BARIS. Hyrcanus is said to have built the stately tower, or rather castle, of Baris, the same which served afterwards for a palace for the Asmonean princes, and was some time after re-built, enlarged, and fortified by Herod; It is to be noticed, that St. Jerome, in his commentary on those sacred books, which were written on the Babylonish captivity, such as those of Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, &c. observes the word Baris to be of Chaldee extraction, peculiar to Palestine, and to signify an house or castle, enclosed on every side.

BEER-SHEBA. In Gen. xxi. we learn that Abraham, having entered into a solemn league of friendship with Abimelech, king of the Philistines, to secure his property in a well he had dug, to guard against the outrage of the Philistines, who had taken several wells from him before, and to ratify the aforesaid alliance, presented the king with oxen, sheep, &c. Then taking seven young sheep, he desired him to accept of them as a token that he had dug such a well, and that he should from thenceforth peaceably enjoy it. On this occasion that place was called Beer-sheba, or, The Well of the Oath, because of the covenant they had sworn there. From this Beer, or well, the city, or considerable town, in process of time built near it, was called Beer-sheba, which was the utmost bound of the Land of Promise on the south, as Dan was towards the north, whence came the proverb from Dan to Beer-sheba. This city was one of those that fell to the tribe of Simeon, but because Simeon had this inheritance in the midst of the tribe of Judah, therefore Beer-sheba is also numbered amongst the cities of Judah.

BELUS, or the Kav-danah, as it is called at present, is a river having its sources about four miles to the eastward of the head of Kishon, near Acra, or Ptolemais, in Palestine. It is very remarkable for its sands, being not only an excellent material for the making of glass, but also for having administered the first occasion or hint of that fine invention.

BERACHAH is a valley in the wilderness of Tekoa, called the Valley of Blessing, or Praise, because of the miraculous rout of the Moabites, Ammonites, and Edomites, or inhabitants of mount Seir, who combined together against Jehoshaphat.

BERENICE was a maritime city of Cyrenaica, once an archbishopric, and one of the five cities from which the region had the appellation of Pentapolis, situated situated between the promontory Bæreum, towards the greater Syrtis, and the city Arsinoc to the east, from whence it is called. It had its name from queen Berenice, wife of Ptolemy III. Here were the gardens of the Hesperides, so celebrated by the ancients, as also the famous sacred grove. There was another Berenice, in like manner so named by Ptolemy, built also in honour of his queen: it was situated near the Arabian Gulph, and is now called Suaquen.

Berytus.

BERYTUS, a maritime city of Phœnicia, near mount Libanus, was anciently called also Beroe. It had a good port. After having been ruined, it was restored by Augustus Cæsar, who made a colony of it, which was called Julia Felix, and enjoyed the Roman rights. Agrippa conducted two legions thither, and Herod also granted it many favours. Though it might be, and really was, in its time, famous on divers accounts, yet it was so for none more than its being one of those three cities where only the law was publicly taught, the other two being Rome and Constantinople. To prove this we may here produce the express declaration of Justinian in these words: "We may command these three volumes, composed by us, to be delivered only in the royal cities, viz. Rome and Constantinople, and the fair city of Berytus, (which may properly be called the nurse of the laws,) as has been appointed by former princes, and in no other places than these, which have merited this privilege from our ancestors." These words inform us that Justinian's predecessors fixed the number of auditories of law to three, but we cannot ascertain the time when it was by them so done. It is now a place of trade, and a stage for the caravans that go to and from Grand Cairo.

Bethel.

BETHEL. In Gen. xxviii. we read that Jacob, in his journey to Padan-aram, being overtaken by the night, lay in the open field, with a stone for his pillow. In his sleep he had a dream of a ladder reaching from that spot to heaven, on which angels ascended and descended, whilst the Almighty encouraged him with a promise of being his protector, &c. Awaking, surprised and astonished, he cried out, "Surely God is in this place, and I knew it not;" wherefore he gave it the name of Bethel, signifying the House of God. It is plain, therefore, that this was the first time, as well as the occasion, that the place had this name, it being added, that it was called Luz at the first, as in former times. This same city was made choice of by Jeroboam for setting up one of his golden calves, whereupon Hosea (alluding to the name given it by Jacob) calls it Bethaven, instead of Bethel; i. e. the House of Vanity, instead of the House of God. Not that it was the town Bethaven properly so called. Bethel being within the lot of Ephraim, the son of Joseph, belonged to the kingdom of Israel, after the ten tribes revolted from the house of David, and lay in the southern border of that kingdom, not far from Jerusalem. But it was taken from the kingdom of Israel by Ahijah, king of Judah, and after that accounted as a part of the kingdom of Judah. Bacchides fortified it in the time of the Maccabees.

Bethlehem.

BETHLEHEM, the city of David of old, is famous for being the birth-place not only of that renowned king, but of Our Blessed Saviour himself, who, according to the flesh, descended from him. This place was otherwise called Ephrath, or Ephratah, sometimes Bethlehem Ephratah, and sometimes Bethlehem Judah, to distinguish it from another Bethlehem, lying in the tribe of Zebulun. It is situated about six or seven miles from Jerusalem to the southward, in the way to Hebron. Bethlehem, though now but thinly inhabited, is seated on a pleasant hill, enjoys an excellent air, and, as it has all along been much honoured by Christians of all nations, on account of its being the place of Our Saviour's birth, so at this very day it is visited by pilgrims and travellers. It is furnished not only with a convent of the Latins, but also with one of the Greeks, and another of the Armenians, the two latter being contiguous to the former.

BETHORON, mentioned in several places of scripture, was situated northward of Jerusalem, and between that metropolis and Shechem. It is to be noted, that there is express mention of two Bethorons in the Chronicles, where we are told that a woman of the tribe of Ephraim, by name Sherah, built Bethoron the nether and the upper. It is accordingly agreed among writers, that they both lay within the bounds of the tribe of Ephraim. But it is not agreed in what part of the tribe each lay, some placing Bethoron the upper in the north border of the tribe, whilst others place them nearer one to another, and both in the south border.

Bethoron.

BETHSAIDA. Bethsaida, in Hebrew, imports a place of fishing, or else of hunting; and both senses agree well with the situation of the city; for it lay on the lake of Gennesareth, just at the influx of the river Jordan into the said lake, and so lay very convenient for fishing. It was conveniently situated for hunting likewise, as lying in the tribe of Naphthali, a country well stored with deer. It was but a village, till Philip the tetrarch built it up to the bulk and appearance of a magnificent city, rich and populous, to which he gave also the name of Julias, out of respect to Julia, the daughter of Cæsar. This city stood on the eastern shore, and therefore is thought, by some, to have been distinct from the Bethsaida of Galilee; but this arises from not considering that the name of Galilee was extended, in its larger acceptation, to the parts lying east of the sea of Galilee. The woe denounced is in some measure come upon it, it being reduced again to the state of a very poor village, or hardly that, consisting long ago of a very few poor cottages.

Bethsaida.

BETHSAN is a city belonging to the half tribe of Manasseh, on the west of Jordan, and the south coast of the sea of Galilee. It is called Bethsa by the Jews. The Canaanites kept possession of it; and it was the most considerable city in the Decapolis after the Israelites had conquered Palestine. It stood in the middle of a great plain, near the mountain of Gilboa. The Greeks gave it the name of Scythopolis; and so it is called in the Maccabees, because anciently inhabited by the Scythians, who, according to Herodotus, had, in the reign of Psamonicus, king of Egypt, and Cyanares, king of Media, extended their conquests as far as Syria and Palestine. It is known among the eastern nations by the name of Elbyzon.

Bethsan.

BETHSHEMETH, a town belonging to the tribe of Judah, lay in the north border, not far west from Kirjath-jearim.

Bethshe-meth.

BETHSURA, so called from being situated on a rock, was a very strong fortress in the time of the Maccabees. It was in the tribe of Judah, and had formerly been fortified by king Rehoboam, being one of the keys of Judea, on the south side of Idumea. That king first built some walls, and other fortifications to it, to keep the revolted Danites in awe; but the Maccabees added such new works as to render the place impregnable. On the top of the hill, where stood Bethsura, is now the village called St. Philip; and though the adjacent parts are called a wilderness, yet they still produce plenty of corn, wine, and olives.

Bethsura.

BEZEC is mentioned, in Judges, as the place where the men of Judah and Simeon made great slaughter of the Canaanites and Perizzites, and where the proud and cruel Adonibezec had his residence. It is again mentioned in scripture as the place where Saul mustered the army wherewith he gave the Ammonites a signal overthrow.

Bezec.

BEZETHA was the name given, by king Agrippa, to a new quarter, which, at immense charge, he had built, and would have beautified and fortified, on the north side of the city of Jerusalem, the name importing the new city. He endeavoured to procure the emperor's leave for surrounding it with a strong wall, which, if he had obtained, it would have rendered the

the metropolis absolutely impregnable. But the danger of the design being represented to Claudius, orders were sent to Agrippa to desist.

Botrys.

BOTRYS, now called Patron and Elpatron, on the coast of Phœnicia, was a very ancient town, founded by Ithobal, king of Sidon, and situated near the promontory, called, by the ancients, Peniel, and, by modern pilots, Capo Pagro. Under the Christian emperors it became an episcopal see; but it has fared so ill since, that there are few traces of its former state remaining, some ruins of churches and monasteries excepted, the rest consisting of a number of poor cots, inhabited chiefly by fishermen, scarcely deserving to be called a village.

Cæsarea.

CÆSAREA. This city was raised by Herod, upon a certain place by the sea-side, called Straton's Tower, as being deemed a very commodious track of ground for that purpose. It was completed at an immense charge, and was the paragon of elegance and magnificence. But the master-piece was the port, which was made as large as the Pyræum, and a safe station against all winds and weathers, not to mention other conveniencies. It stood in Phœnicia, upon the pass into Egypt between Joppa and Dora, two sea-ports, where the south-west wind beats so furiously, that there is no riding in the harbours without being subject to imminent danger. Herod therefore, to encounter this difficulty, ordered a mole to be made in form of a half moon, and large enough for a royal navy to ride in. This mole was two hundred furlongs in extent: one half was designed to break the letting of the sea, and the other half for the foundation of a stone wall, fortified with turrets, calling the largest of them, the Tower of Drusus, from Drusus, the son-in-law of Augustus, who died young. In fine, nothing was wanting that could contribute to grandeur, safety, or convenience. On a mount in the midst stood a temple dedicated to Cæsar, which was of great use to mariners as a sea mark. In this temple there were two statues; the one of Rome, the other of Cæsar; and from hence the city took its name of Cæsarea. Though it is called Cæsarea in the New Testament, yet it is frequently stiled, by way of distinction from others of the same name, Cæsarea Palestinæ, as being the metropolis of Palestine, and seat of the Roman proconsul. Here it was that St. Peter converted Cornelius and his kinsmen, the first fruits of the Gentiles. Here lived Philip the apostle. Here Paul defended himself against the Jews and their orator Tertullius; and here, in the amphitheatre, it was that Herod Antipas was smitten by an angel, as appears from the Acts of the Apostles. As for the times after the New Testament, here was born Eusebius, the learned historian and chronologer, who was bishop of this city in the beginning of the fourth century, and in the reign of Constantine the Great, to whom he made a celebrated oration. It was situated between Ptolemais to the north, and Joppa to the south, and was about twenty-six miles to the westward of Jerusalem. It was of old inhabited partly by Jews, and partly by idolatrous Greeks, who were perpetually at daggers drawing against each other, and ever hatching some new sedition, till Vespasian took it, and put a Roman colony into it.

Cæsarea Philippi.

CÆSAREA PHILIPPI was formerly, by heathen writers, called Paneas, the place where the Jordan had its spring head, which Philip, the brother of Antipas, (Herod) having greatly enlarged and beautified, called it by this new name after his own.

Cana.

CANA of Galilee (so called to distinguish it from Cana, belonging to the tribe of Asher, lying not far from Sidon) mentioned John ii. 1. lay within the tribe of Zebulon, not far from Nazareth. It was the native, or, at least, dwelling-place of Nathaniel, otherwise called Bartholomew; for the Evangelist John expressly stiles him Nathaniel of Cana of Galilee.

CANAAN has been successively known by several names, as the Land of Israel, the Land of God, the Holy Land, and simply the Land; also Judea, Palestine, Syria Palestine, Syria, Cœlo-Syria, Idumea, and Phœnicia. It was called the Land of the Hebrews, and sometimes the Land of the Jews. It was called the Land of God, as given by him to the posterity of Abraham, and the place of his more especial choice. It was called the Holy Land, first by the Jews, as solely appropriated to the service of God under their dispensation; and, secondly, by Christians, as it was the scene of what was wrought for theirs and the world's salvation. Whence came its appellation of Judea is seemingly plain: Judah, being chief of the tribes, communicated its name to the rest; and the kingdom of Judah standing after the dissolution of that of Israel, may have given farther ground for the extensive and general use of this name. It was called Palestine, as being a part of that track very early so denominated. Though this name properly belonged to no more than what is commonly called the Pentapolis of the Philistines, it had the fortune to spread itself over almost all the neighbouring regions.

CAPERNAUM was a city, situated on an eminence by the lake of Genesareth. It took its name from an adjoining spring, of great repute for its chrystalline flowing waters, which was called, by the natives, the Fountain of Capernaum. As the excellence of this fountain was probably one inducement to build the town, so there seems to have been another motive for chusing the situation, viz. its convenience for a wafting place from Galilee to the other side of the sea.

CARMEL (Mount) on the west coast of the Holy Land, at the south-east end of the tribe of Asher, ten miles from Acra, or Ptolemais, is the most remarkable head of land on all the coast. This name Carmel, we are told, was common both to a town and a mountain.

CHALCIS, capital of the island of Chalcis in Judea, stood on the narrowest part of the Euripus, being joined to Bœotia by a bridge, which situation agrees with that of the present city of Negropont. It was celebrated by all the ancients, as a most magnificent, populous, and wealthy city.

CHARRAN, mentioned in Gen. xi. and there called Haran, in memory, as it is said, of Haran, the son of Terah, brother of Abraham, and father of Lot, was situated in the west or north-west part of Mesopotamia, on a river which runs into the Euphrates. It was, with little alteration, called Carræ by the Romans.

CITIUM, anciently a town in Cyprus, was the birth-place of Zeno, the famous stoic.

CŒLO-SYRIA. Ancient geographers differ as to the bounds of what is meant by Cœlo Syria; but the preference is given to Strabo, who tells us, that Cœlo-Syria was between Libanus and Anti-Libanus, which, however the name may be extended, was undoubtedly the proper Cœlo-Syria. The principal cities are Heliopolis, (now Balbeck,) and Damascus, (now Sham).

COMAGENA, the third division of Syria Propria, was so called from its capital, long since destroyed; after which it was, by the Romans, called Euphratenfis, from its situation near the Euphrates. It was bounded on the north by Cilicia and the Lesser Armenia, on the west by part of Cilicia, on the south by Cœlo-Syria, and on the east by the Euphrates. The principal cities in this province were Samofata, (now Scemflat,) Germanicia, Catamana, Deba, Doliche, Chaonia, and Chelinadura; of the greater part of which little else is left but the names, and here and there some ruins of monuments, by which one may know where they stood.

COPTOS,

Coptos, an ancient city of Thebais, having been the chief residence of the native Egyptians for many ages, since their country has been subjected to a foreign power, and whence they received their present name of Copts. It was ruined by Dioclesian.

CYPRUS island was anciently known by various names. It was called Acamis, from one of its promontories; Amathus, Paphios, and Salanfinia, from three of its ancient cities; Macaria, from the fruitfulness of its soil; Aërola, from its copper mines; Collinia, from its many hills; Sphecies, from its ancient inhabitants the Spheces; and Cerattis, from the many promontories, which, like so many horns, (as the Greek word intimates,) shoot into the sea. Cyprus was, by ancient geographers, divided into four districts, denominated from the chief cities of each; besides which cities, and other less ones, here were no fewer than 800 villages. The honey of this island was much commended; as also the wine, oil, wool, and, above all, the copper. It was first discovered by the Phœnicians, about two or three generations, according to Sir Isaac Newton's computation, before Asterius and Minor, kings of Crete; i. e. 1600 years before Christ. It was so overgrown with wood that it could not be tilled; and they first cut it down for the melting of copper; and afterwards, when they began to sail, without fear, on the Mediterranean, (soon after the Trojan war,) they used to build ships, even great navies. They gave every man leave to cut down what trees he pleased, and possess all the cleared ground. In time, other nations, invited by the fertility of the soil, came and settled here. The government was, without doubt, monarchical. It was governed by no less than nine kings, when Cyrus the Great, by his lieutenants, first conquered it. It afterwards became subject to the Ptolemies of Egypt: from them it passed to the Romans; and thence to the Constantinopolitan emperors. It was next conquered by our king Richard, A. D. 1194, in his way to the Holy Land, and the royalty of it given by him to Guy of Lusignan, then titular king of Jerusalem, whose posterity reigned in it during seventeen generations. The Venetians, on failure of that male line, seized it in 1480, and held it till 1570, when Solymán II. claiming it as lord of Egypt, laid siege to Famagusta, the strongest place in it. The Venetians defended it with uncommon bravery, but, for want of timely assistance, were forced to surrender, tho' on honourable terms. The rest were soon subdued, and have groaned under the Turkish yoke ever since. The dukes of Savoy claim the title of king of Cyprus, as descended from Lewis, second husband of Charlotte, grand-daughter of James, the 13th king in descent from Guy aforesaid, who had been put out by James, her husband's brother. But, to speak of this island now in its modern state, it is by far the largest of all those of Asia Minor, lies near the bottom of the Mediterranean, and extends along the south coast of Cilicia, from east to west, about 170 or 200 miles. The country was once very fruitful, as above hinted, though the climate is not very temperate, being excessive hot and sultry in summer, inasmuch that it sometimes dries up all the springs; for there are no springs or rivers, but what rains produce, which happening to fail thirty years successively, during the reign of Constantine the Great, the inhabitants were obliged to abandon the island for some time. It is likewise much infested with locusts, which hover in the air like clouds, during the hot season, and sometimes devour all their corn and fruit, but are often driven into the sea by the winds. On these accounts, as well as the severity of the Turkish government, the country is thinly peopled, and indifferently cultivated, in most parts. Yet, near the cities, it not only produces every thing necessary and delightful, but seems to enjoy a perpetual spring. Here is very good hunting, and a great variety of game. The chief manufactures are cotton and wool, which are the best in all the east. They have likewise silk, but not so good in proportion. They had formerly great quantities of sugar, till one of their bashaws burnt up all the canes. The inhabitants have been always branded for an excessive dissoluteness of manners. The men are accounted warlike, robust, active, and hospitable. Here we must note, when Solymán reduced the island, he murdered, or carried off, all the nobility and gentry, and left none but the meaner sort to continue in it, and these are mostly Greeks, clad after the Italian manner, but retaining their old customs and religion. Jews are interdicted the island, on account of an attempt they made on it in Trajan's reign, in which they massacred 250,000 of the inhabitants. Cyprus has no considerable rivers: and the most noted mountain is that called Olympus. Here is a pretty brisk trade between the merchants of Europe and Asia; and several European nations have their consuls and factors in the island.

CYRENE, now Caïran, or Corene, the metropolis of Cyrenaica, stood at some distance from the sea, on a spot in figure representing a table. It was large and populous, abounding with all the elegancies as well as necessities of life. Its territories produced vast numbers of excellent horses, which probably made the Cyrenians, whether Lybians or Greeks, apply themselves to the study and practice of every thing relating to those animals, more than most nations. Cyrene derived its name from the fountain Cyre, near which it was situated. Aristippus, founder of the sect of Cyrenaics, Eratothanes, the geographer, and Carneades, the philosopher, were all natives of Cyrene; as was Simon, mentioned by St. Luke.

CYRENIAN Jews. Ptolemy, immediate successor of Alexander the Great, as king of Egypt, with a powerful army, laid siege to Jerusalem in the year of the world 3687, before Christ 317, when the Jews, out of a superstitious fear of breaking the sabbath, suffered the city to be taken by storm on that day without resistance, and 100,000 of them were by him carried away captives into Egypt. But reflecting soon on their known loyalty to their former conquerors, and the sacred regard they paid to their oaths, and he, by taking this city, becoming master of Judea and Samaria, committed the keeping of several garrisons, both here and in Egypt, to them; and having made them swear allegiance, he endowed them with the same privileges they had enjoyed under the Macedonians. Of those whom he carried away, he chose about 30,000 of the stoutest to fill his garrisons: the rest he sent, some to assist them with provisions, others into Lybia and Cyrene just spoken of, of which he had made conquest, and added it to Egypt, four years before. From these latter were descended the Cyrenian Jews, among whom was Jason, author of the history of the Maccabees, in five books, now lost, but of which the second book of the Maccabees is an epitome. (See 2 Macc. ii. 23.) Of the same country were those Cyrenian Jews mentioned in the Acts. This Jewish colony grew in time so numerous, as to have 1000 of them put to death, for one mutiny, in the time of Vespasian; and yet, in a succeeding reign, they proved strong enough to master the whole province, and massacre 200,000 inhabitants of other nations. Their rage and fury, in short, were boundless, so that, through this and other massacres, Cyrenaica was next to quite dispeopled.

DAGON, Temple of, see Gaza; and, for a description of his image, see Ashdod.

DAMASCUS is the capital of the south part of Syria. It is the most remarkable place for antiquity now in the whole world, being generally agreed to have been built by Uz, son of Aram, and grandson of Shem, the son of Noah; and was the birth-place of Eliezer, the steward of Abraham. It is famous, in scripture, for being the residence of the kings of Syria 300 years; till Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, slew Rezin, the last king of Syria, and added his dominions to his own new empire; in consequence of which, the Syrian kingdom passed to the Persian Perſian and to the Grecian, till the Saracens conquered it, and made this city their royal reſidence. In this ſtate it continued till Bagdat was built, at which time it was very ſtrong and flouriſhing. It became afterwards a ſeparate kingdom, under the princes of the Selzuccian family, for near 200 years, which ended by the reduction of the city, and death of its laſt prince, by Halaon, the Tartar. Its Hebrew name was Dameſech; and the Turks now call it Schan, or Scan. It is ſituated in a fertile plain, encompassed with hills, and upon the celebrated river Chryſorroa, (i. e. golden ſtream;) called, by the Syrians, Pharpar, and which enriches the city and its country with all kinds of plenty and pleaſure. The emperor Julian ſtiled it the City of Jupiter, the Eye of the Eaſt; and added, that it excelled all others in the magnificence of its temples, tempera- ture of its ſeaſons, excellent fountains, number of ſprings, and fruitfulness of ſoil. Its territory produces the beſt corn, wine, and fruits, all the year, which renders the place exceeding rich and delight- ful. The city is of an oblong form, ſlender to- wards the middle, and bulges out at both ends, ef- pecially that to the north-eaſt. It is computed to be about two miles in length; and is ſo thick beſet with towers, domes, fine gardens, ſummer-houſes, turrets, &c. that it yields a moſt noble proſpect, and, from the adjacent hills, looks like a ſtately city in a wood, enriched with moſt delightful and conſtant verdure, occaſioned by the vaſt quantity of water with which the river Barrady ſupplies both town and country. The public buildings bear a much better outſide than the private. The chief of all is the great moſque, formerly a Chriſtian church, built by the emperor Heraclius, in honour of Za- chariah, father of John Baptiſt, ſaid to be buried in it. This moſque is reckoned one of the moſt ſtately in all Turkey, into which it is death for any but a Muſſulman to enter. The city has ſeparate wards for every trade, and theſe are ſhut up every night by gates, and by a ſtout iron chain by day, to keep off beaſts of burthen. In particular here are not leſs than 20,000 perſons employed in making ſcy- meters, ſword blades, knives, and other cutlery work, bridles, and divers other things in iron and ſteel, all which are in great repute for the fine tem- per which the Barrady water gives thoſe metals. On one ſide of the city lies that which they call the Meidan, or the Green, (Alger Damascenus;) which is a ſpacious graſs field, encompassed with gardens, through which runs a branch of the Barrady. On the ſide of this green is a ſpacious noble hoſpital for pilgrims of all religions. The building is ſur- rounded with cloiſters, adorned with ſmall cupolas, and a great number of chambers for ſtrangers, who are maintained at the charge of the grand ſeignior. There is likewiſe another cloiſter for the mainte- nance of poor ſcholars, with a moſque, and hand- ſome gardens. On another ſide is a large houſe, where they bake biſcuits for thoſe pilgrims who travel to Mecca, and of which the ſultan allows them 200 camels load, and the like quantity of water. Almoſt in the heart of the city is an high caſtle, of an oval ſhape, moſtly of ſquare ſtone, and flanked with fourteen ſquare towers, in which are ſome cannon. Here are 1500 janiffaries con- ſtantly; 500 to guard the city, 500 to eſcort the caravan to Mecca, and 500 to attend the grand ſeignior when he goes to Bagdat. The city is go- verned by a beglerberg, who has ten ſangiacs un- der him, beſides agas, cadis, and other officers. Damafcus is the ſeat of a Greek patriarch, tranſ- lated hither from Antioch. It was the birth-place of the celebrated and eſteemed St. John, thence furnamed Damafcus. All ſorts of Chriſtians are allowed churches and their particular ceremonies here. Jews are in great numbers, and have ſtately ſynagogues. Other ſects make but little figure.

Damietta.

DAMIATA, or DUMIATA, in Lower Egypt, is ſituated on one of the eaſt branches of the Nile. This branch, and that called the Peluſiac, or ut- moſt eaſtern, form a kind of ſmall triangular iſland, on the weſt angle of which this city is ſitu- ate. It is one of the moſt conſiderable for trade in the whole territory about it, and the moſt fertile in all Egypt. It is reckoned one of the keys of Egypt, is large, though now ill built, and contains about 25,000 inhabitants. It fell, with the reſt of Egypt, under the yoke of the Saracens, who held it till 1218, when the cruſaders laid ſiege to it, and took it the next year; but had ſcarce held it three years, when thoſe infidels, letting out the water about them, forced them to abandon it. Lewis, (ſurnamed Saint,) king of France, regained it in the year 1249, but having been taken priſoner about a year after, was forced to reſtore it for his ranſom. The Saracens, it is ſaid, then burnt it, that it might no more be ſuch a bone of contention. It ſoon re- covered, and is now a place of great trade, and the ſeat of an archbiſhop, under the patriarch of Alex- andria. Copts and Greeks here ſettled have each a church, and free exerciſe of religion. The town is under the government of an aga, cadi, and ſub- bachi, all appointed by the baſhaw of the province, who exacts part of their income. The inhabitants are ſeverally employed in manufactures, particu- larly of fine linen cloth of all colours. But they ſo abhor ſtrangers, eſpecially Europeans, on account of the cruſades, (the chief ſcene of which in Egypt was hereabout,) that they can ſcarce let them paſs along without inſult. Some have confounded Da- miata with Old Peluſium, or ſuppoſed it to have been reared from its ruins; but this error has been fully refuted.

DAN, the Tribe of, had their portion of the Land of Promise thus ſituate; the Philiftines and Judah on the ſouth; Benjamin, Ephraim, and the half tribe of Manaſſeh, north; and the Mediterranean weſt. This diſtrict is plain and level, but not ſo fruitful as that of the ſaid half tribe, having, in moſt parts, leſs depth of ſoil, and bordering on the ſea coaſt in a range of mountains.

DAN, City of, hath the ſaid name given it in Ge- neſis and Deuteronomy. It was called alſo Laith. It was ſituated at the head of the Jordan, and was uſually accounted the utmoſt north border of the Land of Irael, as Beer-ſheba was of the ſouth; whence, as before obſerved, the expreſſion, "From Dan to Beer-ſheba," to denote the whole length of the Holy Land from north to ſouth. Here it was that Jeroboam placed one of his golden calves. By Gentile writers it was called Paneas, from the adjoining ſpring Panicum, or Panion. This Dan, with its territory, was given, by Auguſtus, to He- rod the Great, who left it to Philip, his youngeſt ſon, together with the tetrarchy of Iturea and Tra- chonitis, to which it adjoined, and he repairing and beautifying it, made it his capital, or at leaſt his reſidence, giving it the name of Cæſarea Phi- lippi, or the Cæſarea of Philip, to ingratiate him- ſelf with Tiberius Cæſar, and to diſtinguiſh it from another place of the ſame name.

DAPHNE, near Antioch. To the account already given of Antioch, we may add, that Cæſar Gallus having, out of zeal to Chriſtianity, cauſed a Chriſ- tian church to be built there, the Daphnian Oracle immediately ceaſed. There were ſeveral places of this name beſides the foregoing, viz. a town of Egypt, near Peluſium; an iſland of Ethiopia; alſo a ſmall region of Theſſaly, through which flowed the river Paneus.

DATHEMA is the name of that fortrefs in the land of Gilead, mentioned in the firſt book of the Mac- cabs.

DECAPOLIS was a canton in Paleſtine, ſo called from its (Deca) ten cities, ſituate ſome on one, and ſome on the other, ſide Jordan, the capital of which was Scythopolis. It was moſtly inhabited by Gen- tiles.

DELPHOS, or Delphi, was the chief city of an- cient Phocis, famous for the temple of Apollo, whole oracle was reſorted to by all from all parts of Europe, Aſia, and Africa. Delphos, among ſeveral other cities of Greece and Peloponeſus, contended for be- ing ſituate in the very middle of the world. It had ſo convenient a harbour, and was ſo excellently well ſituated, situated, (being rather in the heart of Greece than of the world,) that it became, in time, a sessions town of all the Grecian states. Here sat the court of the Amphictyones, chosen out of the prime cities of Greece, and so called from Amphictyon, first founder of this high court. The time of their assembling was in spring and autumn. Causes of all kinds were brought before them, from all parts of Grecia; and their sentence was deemed definitive. Mention of them is frequently made in history. Considering, therefore, the great concourse which this court, the oracle, and the games celebrated in honour of Apollo, brought into the city, we need not wonder at its being one of the most opulent of all Greece. As an instance of which, it may be noticed, that the gold and silver of which the temple was despoiled, (the 4th year of the 105th Olympiad,) on occasion of the Grecian holy war, as it was called, amounted to 10,000 talents; i. e. above, 1,000,000. English money. Delphos was situate in ancient Achaia, now Livadia, in Turkey in Europe, on the south side of Mount Parnassus, where the town of Castri now stands. This modern town does not consist of above 200 houses, and those very ill built. It stands between Salona and Livadia, about ten miles from the latter. The number of Turks are very insignificant, though they have a mosque. The Greeks have five or six churches, and are deemed a very good people, though poor. The little trade they have, consists in cotton and tobacco. Their wine is exceeding good.

DELTA, or the Lower Egypt, reaching from Hep-tanomis to the Mediterranean Sea, contained not only that part which is compassed by the arms of the Nile, and, from its triangular figure, named Delta, but also Mazeotis and Alexandria, with its dependencies, to the west, and Casiotis, with some other territories towards Arabia, to the east. There are various opinions and conjectures concerning the ancient state of this part of the world, but it is now acknowledged to be the most fertile and best cultivated land in the whole kingdom of Egypt, containing above 360 villages, and yielding grapes and other fruits in abundance; and it fails not bearing even in those years when the Nile, not rising to its usual height, occasions a scarcity in other parts.

DIOSPOLIS was anciently a city in the Lesser Thebais, in Egypt. There was another town of this name in Palestine, vulgarly called Rhama, which Gallus, the Roman general, destroyed at the same time, and for the same cause, as he did some other adjacent places, viz. the frequent revolt of the Jews.

DORA, or Dor, was a maritime town, and considerable city, strongly situate near Mount Carmel, on the Mediterranean Sea, whence it gave name to the country about it. It was given to the half tribe of Manasseh on this side (i. e. the west side) of Jordan. Jerome observes, that it lay nine miles from Tyre, and was gone quite to decay in his time, so as to be uninhabited.

DOTHAN, mentioned in Gen. xxxvii. was seated about twelve miles to the northward of Samaria. In the neighbourhood of it Joseph was sold, by his brethren, to the Ishmaelites.

ECBATANA. As there are now no monuments remaining either of the magnificent mausoleum ascribed to Daniel, or the proud palace where the monarchs of Asia went to pass the summer, there is great disagreement, among our modern travellers, about the place where this stately metropolis stood. It is the opinion of many writers, that Tauris is the same with the ancient and famous Ecbatana. Our author assures us, that the palace built by Daniel was entire in his time, but, at present, not even the ruins of any magnificent building are to be seen either at Tauris, or in that neighbourhood; for, in all the ruins there, the materials are only earth, brick, and pebbles, which, in ancient times, were never used in Media for building of palaces.

ECBATANA, a town in Syria, is remarkable for the death of Cambyses, king of Persia, there. This Cambyses, son of Cyrus, is the Ahaluerus of our bible. While he was in Egypt, having consulted the oracle of Butus in that country, he was told that he should die at Ecbatana, which he understanding of Ecbatana in Media, resolved to preserve his life by never going thither: but what he thought to avoid in Media, he found in Syria; for the town where he lay sick of his mortal wound was of the same name, being also called Ecbatana.

EDOM. When the ancient kingdom of Edom was in its meridian, it was supposed to have been bounded on the north by Canaan, and the lake Asphaltitis; on the east by Midian; on the south by the Arabian Gulph, or Red Sea; and on the west by Amalekitis. This track is very mountainous, and great part of it desert. It has few or no streams, but latent springs of water for the use of the inhabitants, who know where to find them. Corn and wine, nevertheless, seem to have been anciently in some degree of plenty amongst them. So that Esau (that is, the posterity of Esau, or Edom) may anciently have enjoyed the "faintness of the earth," according to his father's prophetic blessing, Gen. xxvii. 39. though by modern travellers this country is deemed rather an unfertile spot. Amalekitis is by some reckoned to have been a part or province of Edom. The cities, and most remarkable places, of Edom, were, Teman, Dedan, Bozrah, Elath, Mount Hor, and the Valley of Salt. Now, though the name of this kingdom is frequently rendered Idumea, for Edomea, (as in our version of the bible,) yet, when that name occurs in prophane and more modern writers, it must not be understood of the ancient Edom, which, losing its old name, was comprehended under the general appellation of Arabia Petrea, and the Third Palestine. The south part of Canaan came to be called Idumea, and the whole nation of the Jews sometimes Idumeans. These people were at first ruled by patriarchs, or heads of families; and after that by kings, who were elected into the regal office. This elective kingdom was, some how or other, interrupted and dissolved, and the ancient form took place again, till, perceiving the imperfections of this kind of administration, they coalesced under one king, thereby to be the better enabled to withstand an invasion from the Israelites when they came out of Egypt. It was governed after by Edomitish kings quite down to the days of king David, who conquered the country: from which time they were kept under subjection to the kings of Judah, though always impatient under the yoke, and only waiting for a favourable opportunity of shaking it off. They were a bold and daring people, fond of broils and tumults, which they as much delighted in as others in the softening pleasures of luxury. Concerning their religion we are much in the dark. At first they were right in their belief and practice, as they were descended from Isaac, and used circumcision; but, by degrees, they forgot all, degenerated into idolatry, and disused circumcision. In the end, however, they coalesced with the Jews, and were ever after considered as but one nation with them in divine matters. The Romans conquered this country after the reduction of Judaea, and made it the sixth district in the division of Syria. The Turks are now in possession of it; though it appears not that they maintain much, if any, government in it, except on the sea-coast, for securing the road from Egypt to Judea, where stand some castles and villages, as Arissa, Dinhabah, &c. it being now inhabited by a wild, roving kind of Arabs, but who are not all entirely so barbarous and rude as some represent them.

EGYPT, called by its ancient inhabitants Chemia, and by the Copts at present, was so named, according to the general opinion of writers, from Ham, or Cham, the son of Noah, being more than once in the Psalms stiled the Land of Ham: but the name name by which it is generally denoted in Scripture, is the Land of Mizraim, from whence the Arabians still call it Mesr, which the Greeks write Mesre, or Mestrea. Ancient Egypt is divided, by some, into two parts, the Upper and the Lower Egypt; by others into three; the upper, properly so called, or Thebais; the middle, or Heptanomis; and the lower, of which the best part was the Delta. Thebais, now called Al Said, is the most southern part of Egypt next to Ethiopia, and is near as large as all the rest, including the country on both sides the Nile down to Heptanomis, its last cities having been Lycopolis on the west, and Anteopolis on the east, side of the river, which agrees with the present extent of Al Said, the most northern city of which is Manfalut. There were formerly in this part of Egypt a great number of large and magnificent cities, with temples of several deities, and tombs of their ancient princes. Its metropolis, Thebes, called afterwards Diapolis, (i. e. City of Jupiter,) was situate on the Nile, and deservedly reckoned one of the finest cities in the world. Its 100 gates are mentioned by Homer, whence it had the surname of Hecatom-pulos. Its riches were so great, that, after it had been plundered by the Persians, what was found, on burning the remains of the pillage, amounted to about 300 talents of gold, and 2300 of silver. Who was its founder is uncertain. As the name Thebes was formerly given to all Egypt, its great power is the more credible. Heptanomis was so called from the seven Nomes, or prefectures, into which it was divided. It was full of very large and noble cities, the principal of which was Memphis, built by Menes, their first king, and, for many ages, capital of the whole kingdom. Here also was the lake Neris, the Labyrinths, and the Pyramids. The chief cities of the Delta were Tanis, Sais, and Xoïs, and in later times Alexandria. The climate of Egypt must needs be very warm, from its near situation to the tropic. Though the air is generally dry, yet great dews fall after the swelling of the Nile, which continue for several months. In the Delta it sometimes rains a little in the winter, notwithstanding what some ancients say to the contrary; and even snow, it is said, has been observed to fall at Alexandria. In Upper Egypt, indeed, towards the cataracts, it rains very seldom. The first summer, (for they reckon two,) which is in March, April and May, is the most inconvenient and sickly season, because the unequal weather, excessive heats, and hot winds, cause distempers; but in the second, June, July, and August, and in autumn and winter, the inhabitants breathe a much cooler air, the weather is more constant, and it is more delightful living, except from the 7th to the 14th of February, when the cold is so felt that the rich wear furs. The fertility of Egypt, and the excellence of its productions and fruits, were greatly celebrated by the ancients, and by Moses himself, in the book of Genesis. It was the granary of Old Rome, as it is now of Constantinople. The most plentiful parts are the Delta, and the province now called Al Feyyum. For this great fertility the land is indebted to the river Nile. The sources of this celebrated river were unknown to the ancients; but they are now well known to be in Ethiopia. The annual inundations of this river has been looked on as one of the greatest wonders of the country. Ancient writers tell us it begins to rise in Egypt about the summer solstice, and continues so to do till after the autumnal equinox, for about 100 days, and then it decreases as many, till it retires within its banks, and overflows no more till next year. If the river did not rise to 15 or 16 cubits, the country was not covered with its waters, and dearth ensued. This account comes very near to those of modern travellers. As this river could not of itself overflow the lands every where in the necessary proportion, they have cut a vast number of canals: however, as some places lie too high to be watered by the canals, they are obliged to raise the water to cover them by engines. Formerly they made use of Archimedes's screw, thence named the Egyptian pump, but now they generally use wheels, which carry a rope or chain of earthen pots of about seven or eight quarts each, and draw the water from the canals. There are besides a vast number of wells, from which the water is drawn in the same manner to water the gardens and fruit-trees; so that it is no exaggeration of the matter, to say there are, in Egypt, above 200,000 oxen daily employed in this single labour; besides the men who draw water in wicker baskets, so close and well made that not a drop runs through. As the land lies perfectly even, they cut their gardens into little square beds, which are all surrounded with trenches, which immediately furnish as much water as is necessary; and by these means they have the finest and most fertile gardens in the world. Pomegranates, oranges, and several sorts of trees, afford a shade and coolness, that, notwithstanding the heat of the climate, make it delightful walking. The Egyptians have not the laborious task of ploughing, digging, or breaking the clods, but when the river has retired, they have no more to do than to mix a little sand with the earth to abate its strength, after which they sow with as little pains, and almost without charge. The pastures are most excellent, the grass generally growing to the height of the cattle. In fine, there is not a more pleasant sight in the world than Egypt in two seasons. Of the animal productions, the crocodile is the most remarkable. This amphibious creature is not, indeed, peculiar to the Nile, it being frequent enough in the Ganges, and other large rivers of India. With respect to vegetable productions, though woods are very rare in Egypt, yet there are some forests of palm-trees towards the deserts of Lybia: and near Dandera, the ancient Tontyra, is one of wild dates, whose fruit is excessive hard, but much admired. However, Egypt is not a country proper for trees; but the case is different as to plants, which are various, and many of them highly useful. Amongst the artificial curiosities of this country are the pyramids, those stupendous structures, which were deservedly reckoned, by the ancients, among the wonders of the world. The Egyptian Labyrinth, from whence Daedalus is supposed to have taken the model of that which he afterwards built in Crete, though he therein imitated but the hundredth part of it, was a celebrated structure; and Herodotus, who saw it, says, that it far surpassed the report of fame, being, in his judgment, even more admirable than the pyramids. But admirable as the Labyrinth was, the lake Meris, by which it stood, is said to be yet more wonderful: according to the ancients, this lake was much larger than it is now, and one place in particular, which the water has left, is, indeed, become a dangerous quicksand, wherein men and cattle are sometimes lost. Later relations assure us, it is now above half a league broad, and a day's journey in length, being in circuit above twelve or fifteen leagues. And even this is prodigious enough, if we consider that it was the work of mens hands, as appears from the two pyramids built in the midst of it, which were standing in the time of Herodotus. With respect to the government, laws, religion, customs, &c. of the ancient Egyptians, we shall be as concise as possible. They are said to be the first who found out the rules of government, and the art of making life easy, and people happy, the true end of politics. Other nations, particularly the Grecians, borrowed the best part of those which they established at home of this nation. The crown was hereditary, yet their first kings were obliged to conform themselves to the established laws of the land, even in their private way of life. They could not punish any person out of passion or caprice, nor give judgment but as law prescribed. While they thus behaved, they were infinitely dear to their people, the state was flourishing, and their extended dominion became exceeding rich and populous, and enabled them to adorn the kingdom with works of inimitable magnificence. The king, priests, and soldiers, made, as it were, the three estates of the nation. The Egyptians were very careful in the administration of justice, formed most excellent laws, and minutely attended to the execution of them. But as much as the Egyptians seemed to excel other nations in the wisdom of their laws and constitutions, they surpassed them in bigotry and superstition. They are said to have been the first who erected idolatrous altars, images, and temples; and the first inventors of festivals, ceremonies, and transactions with the gods

by the mediation of others, and to have first given names to the twelve gods. They had many deities, of different ranks and orders. Those chiefly honoured were Osiris and Isis, by which it is most probable they originally meant the Sun and Moon, whose influences governed and preserved the world. Their idolatrous practices became so general at last, that they gave divine honours to several animals; nay, even to some vegetables. We can only hint, that the Egyptians were early famous for many arts and sciences, and particularly so for that called magic. To whomsoever the invention may justly be ascribed, it is certain the art was very ancient here. They had magicians who pretended to the interpretation of dreams, and a way of divining by a cup, in the time of Joseph. Gen. xlv. 5, 15. What were the real grounds of this science is not for us to say. We have entering upon the Egyptian chronology, in order to present a concise account of the modern state of Egypt. This land, though once so populous, and full of noble and opulent cities, is so far decayed and fallen from its pristine splendor, that it hath now very few places deserving to be called cities, either for extent, strength, beauty, or populousness. Scarce any are enclosed with walls; and many, formerly celebrated for their wealth and beauty, are now no other than overgrown villages, without ramparts or walls. Though Egypt is now by no means so populous as it has formerly been, yet these huge villages, or unwalled towns, are still very numerous, and so near to each other in some parts, that they appear almost contiguous, especially from Cairo to Rosetta, as well as along the canal of Damietta, and much more so in the heart of the Delta. Egypt is now inhabited not only by the Copti, or ancient natives, but by Arabs, Moors, Turks, Greeks, Jews, Franks, and others. The Coptic was the ancient language. But the Greek being introduced by Alexander, &c. continued to be spoken 900 years, till the Greeks were driven out by the Arabs, since which the Arabic hath continued the common language of the country, as they are the most numerous. However, they are kept severely under by the Turks, scarce any of them being admitted into offices. Both men and women (contrary to the ancient Egyptians, who were the most cleanly people in the world) are commonly very nasty, as well as rude and ignorant; and as they have not only embraced the doctrine of Mahomet, but are even more zealous observers of it than the Turks, so that has continued the principal religion of the country. The climate is naturally so excessive hot as to occasion a great variety of diseases, extremely dangerous; and, what is far worse, the plague often rages with such violence as to sweep off myriads in a year in the whole country.

EKRON, situated north-west of Gath, in Palestine, was the most northern of all the five cities which gave names to the five lordships of the Philistines, lay in the north border of Judah, and was consequently a frontier town. It was once a place of great wealth and power, and is much spoken of in Scripture; but it faded away to a great degree of obscurity; and although the name, and even very considerable vestiges of what it had once been, subsisted for many ages, it happens that no mention is made of it in prophane authors. It was famous for its idol Baalzebub, called the god of Ekron, which was next in repute and dignity to that of Dagon.

ELAH. The valley of Elah, or of the Terebinth, lay in the road from Eleutheriopolis to Jerusalem. Here it was that David slew Goliath. As to the height of this gigantic Philistine, according to the English standard, it was twelve feet eight inches, and somewhat better than three tenths. His coat of mail weighed 5000 shekels of brass, or upwards of 189 of our pounds troy; and by the same rule the head of his spear, which weighed 600 shekels of iron, exceeded 22 of the same pounds. The weight of these, and the other parts of his armour, was not, we may imagine, too heavy for so huge a person, his strength, doubtless, being in proportion to his stature.

No. 57.

ELAM, mentioned in several parts of Scripture, was a kingdom on the river Ulai, to the eastward of the Tigris. It was the Susiana of the Greeks, and lay so opportunely for Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, (who was, according to Jeremiah's prophecy, to subdue it,) that he could have been no great while in completing its reduction; though, from the prophecy, Elam must have been a great and potent kingdom. And it seems to have waged war with the king of Scythia, beyond the river Oxus, with various success. Chodorlaomer was the first king of Elam, and he extended his conquests over many provinces of Asia. Elam.

ELATH was a fair and commodious haven on the Arabian Gulph, or Red Sea, adjoining to the south-east part of Mount Seir, or Land of Edom, and, for a long time, was a situation for the shipping which was sent from those parts into the Indies. It lies near the road the Egyptian pilgrims take when they go to Mecca. In the fourteenth century there were considerable remains of it standing. This was one of the places whence the Jews traded for gold to Ophir. It was also a great mart of the Tyrians. Elath.

ELEPHANTINE, Island of, was situated opposite Sienna, in Upper Egypt. It had a small city, and is supposed to have taken its name from the elephants found on it. The Romans terminated their empire here, and so do the Egyptians their navigation on the Nile. This small territory is pleasant and fruitful, though hot; and the trees and vines are covered with leaves all the year round. It is allowed the last place belonging to Egypt on this side. Elephantine.

ELEUTHERUS is a river mentioned in the Maccabees, and by geographers set down as the boundary of Syria and Phœnicia. The moderns, with one consent, give that name to a river between Tyre and Sidon, called, by the Turks, Calimea, but the ancients place it more to the northward. The writer of the Maccabees lays it in the land of Hamath, which country, wherever it was, was certainly without the borders of Israel, as appears from the same author. Eleutherus.

ELYMAIS, the metropolis of a province of the same name, lying between the rivers Eulæus and Orontes, and extending from the confines of Media to the Persian Gulph, was famous for a rich temple consecrated to Diana, which was plundered by one of the Parthian kings, who found in it 10,000 talents. The Elymeans, as Strabo informs us, were a powerful people, inured to the toils of war, skillful bowmen, &c. and never subdued by the Syro-Macedonian or Parthian kings, but governed by their princes. He dates the rise of this kingdom from the downfall of the Persian monarchy. Their kings are often spoken of by the ancients, but not one by name. All we know of them is, that they assisted Antiochus in his wars with Rome, but afterwards cut off both him and his army in defence of their temple. Elymais.

EMESA, or EMISSA, was a city of Syria Proper, placed by most of the eminent geographers on the Orontes, between Apamia and Laodicea Caliosa. The emperor Heliogabalus was a native of it. It made a great figure during the reign of the Seleucidæ, and became an episcopal see under that of Antioch. It was afterwards taken from the Mussulmen Arabs, by the crusaders, in 1098, and retaken by Saladin about 100 years after. The Tartars mastered it about 1258, and afterwards were driven out of it by the Mussulmen Mamalukes, and there at length by the Turks. It is now called Chems, and Aman or Haman, and is under the beglerberg of Damascus, who keeps a deputy-governor and a garrison in it. It is surrounded by strong walls, with six handsome gates, and stately towers, at proper distances. The castle, which appears to be Roman, stands on an eminence, which commands the town and adjacent parts. Here are likewise some fine new churches, though the greater part of them are now turned into mosques. The chief commerce of the place consists in silk of the finest manufacture. The Emesa.

gardens about it, as well as the neighbouring country, are very fertile and delightful, abounding with fruits of all sorts, especially with mulberry trees, to feed silk worms with, and these are planted in rows of considerable length, very regular, and well watered.

Emma. EMMA, the same as Amatha before described. The Jews gave the name of Hamah, or Hammath, to all places that had such waters: that of Emmaus is the same, only softened according to the Greek idiom. We must not, therefore, confound this with the following.

Emmaus. EMMAUS, according to St. Luke, was a village about 60 furlongs from Jerusalem west. It was afterwards made a city, and a Roman colony, and called Nicopolis.

Endor. ENDOR, mentioned in Scripture as the place of residence of a woman that had a familiar spirit, and to whom Saul applied to raise up Samuel, &c. was a city of the half tribe of Manasseh, on the west of Jordan.

Engedi. ENGEDI had anciently the name of Hazezon-tamar. It was a city in the tribe of Judah, not far from the Salt Sea, and in a wilderness, or desolate country. Engedi is noticed for its camphire, or (as others render it) cypress: and Jerome tells us it was remarkable for opo-balsamum, supposed to be the same now called balm of Gilead, and that it was a great town in his days.

Ephesus. EPHESUS, in Ionia, in Asia Minor, called by the present inhabitants Aiasalogus, was, in former times, the metropolis of all Asia. Pliny styles it the ornament of Asia, and Strabo the greatest and most frequented emporium of it. The ancient Ephesus was, indeed, very far different from the modern, which is but a sorry village, inhabited by thirty or forty Greek families, as ignorant as inconsiderable. The ancient city stood about 50 miles southward of Smyrna, near the mouth of the river Cayster, and the shore of the Icarian Sea, which is a bay of the Ægean; but as it has been so often destroyed and rebuilt, it is not easy to determine the precise place. Most modern travellers are of opinion, that the ancient city stood more to the southward than the present, which they argue from the ruins that still remain. Ephesus, in ancient times, was known by several names. When in the Roman times it was the metropolis of all Asia, it acknowledged Lyfimachus for its founder, because that prince, having caused the ancient city to be entirely demolished, rebuilt, at a vast expence, a new one, in a place more convenient, and nearer the temple. This new Ephesus was greatly damaged by an earthquake in the reign of Tiberius, but by him repaired and embellished with several stately buildings, of which there are now but few ruins to be seen, and scarce any thing worthy of ancient Ephesus. The aqueduct, part of which is still standing, is generally believed to have been the work of the Greek emperors. The pillars which support the arches are of fine marble, and higher or lower, as the level of the water required. This aqueduct served to convey water into the city from the spring of Haltee, mentioned by Pausanias. The Cayster was formerly navigable, and afforded a safe place for ships to ride in, but is now almost choaked up with sand. But the chief ornament of Ephesus was the so much celebrated temple of Diana, built at the common charge of all the states of Asia, and, for its structure, size, and furniture, accounted among the wonders of the world. According to Pliny, an incredible space of time was spent in building this wonderful temple by all Asia. The pillars, which were of marble curiously carved, or highly polished, were the works of the most famous artists of antiquity; and the altar was almost wholly the performance of that great master Praxiteles. This temple had the privilege of an asylum, which at first extended to a furlong, afterwards enlarged by Mithridates to a bowshot, and doubled by Mark Anthony, so that it took in part of the city. But Tiberius put a stop to the many abuses and disorders that attended privileges of this kind, and declared that no man, guilty of any wicked or dishonest action, should escape justice, though he fled to the altar itself. All the Ionians resorted yearly to Ephesus with their wives and children, where they solemnized the festival of Diana with great pomp and magnificence, making on that occasion rich offerings to the goddess, without forgetting her priests. The great Diana of the Ephesians, as she was styled by her blind adorers, was, according to Pliny, but a small statue of ebony, made by one Canetia. As Ephesus was, in the days of heathenism, famous for the temple, so it was, in the first Christian times, adorned with a magnificent church, honoured with the name of St. John's. It is yet standing, and represented by a traveller of eminence, as peculiarly striking to a stranger, from the loftiness of its fabric, though now converted into a Turkish mosque. Not far from hence was a stately lavatory of porphyry, called St. John's Font, the diameter of which was above seven pikes, wherein it is said he baptized great multitudes. The aqueduct on the east side appears not very antique, at least it seems to have been repaired in latter times, some stones being reversed in the walls, and seeming as if placed so by the ignorant Turks as they came casually to hand. So now the reliques of the Gentiles, the Christians, and the Turks, are subverted and heaped promiscuously together: for the whole town is nothing but a habitation of herdsmen and farmers, in low cottages of dirt, covered on the top with earth, sheltered from the extremity of the weather by mighty masses of ruinous walls, the pride and ostentation of former days, and the emblem in these of the frailty of the world, and the transient vanity of human glory. We conclude with observing, that the Turks took Ephesus under Mahomet I. the son of Bajazet, since which it hath remained under them, and that its commerce was transported to Smyrna and Scalanova.

EPHRAIM was a tribe. Also Ephraim, in which was the wood where Absalom perished on an oak, mentioned in the 2d book of Samuel, and is undoubtedly to be understood not of any wood lying in the tribe of Ephraim on the west of Jordan, (for Absalom, as well as David, were passed over Jordan,) but of some wood lying on the east side of Jordan, and so named on some other account, perhaps, as lying over against the tribe of Ephraim.

EPHRATA, being the same city as Bethlehem, see Ephraim that article.

EPHRON is mentioned, in the Maccabees, as a great and strong city, lying in the direct way between the land of Gilead and that of Judah.

ETHIOPIA. Several of the ancients gave the name of Ethiopians to all persons either perfectly black, or of a very swarthy complexion. The Arabs, therefore, and other Asiatics, as well as a great number of Africans, fell under this denomination. We find the Africans divided into the west, or Hesperian Ethiopians; and the Ethiopians above Egypt to the east of the former. The first inhabited that vast track called Lybia Interior, but the second were looked upon as the proper Ethiopians. As proper Ethiopia might anciently have been of different extent at different times, its frontiers cannot be precisely fixed. In scripture Cush, when taken for a country, is always to be understood of the proper Ethiopia. The ancients imagined the blackness of the Ethiopians, Abassines, and Abyssians, to be occasioned by the intense heat of their climate, and therefore so named them. As we have not room to specify all the several Ethiopian nations, as to their characters and customs, we shall only touch on some particulars. The Struthophagi (or ostrich eaters) lived upon ostriches. They had several arts and devices to take this their food, though that animal defended itself against them with stones, which it threw out of its feet with great violence. Of the skins of these creatures they made both garments and coverlids for their beds. The Ichthyophagi (or fish-eaters) by stopping up the passages passages of certain caverns on the coast of the Red Sea, part of which they inhabited, with stones, enclosed vast numbers of large and small fishes, which, upon the reflux of the tide, were left there as in a net, and served them for food. As they fed on fish in their life-time, so they fed on them after death, for they carried their dead to the sea-shore, where they lay till the tide carried them off. The Chelonophagi (or tortoise-eaters) not only lived upon those fishes, but covered their huts with the shells, and used them also as boats. The Acridophagi (or locust-eaters) had a deep valley in the country of many furlongs, which they took care to fill with wood, &c. and when the south wind drove vast numbers of locusts thither, they set the combustibles on fire, and the smoke suffocated these animals, so infinite in number, that the ground, for leagues, was covered with their bodies, which these people seasoned with salt, and lived upon the following year. The Spermatophagi and Hylophagi formed two neighbouring cantons; the first feeding on the fruits that fell from the trees in summer, but the rest of the year on a sweet plant, with a stalk, somewhat resembling that of a turnip; and the latter on the buds and tender shoots of trees. These were people of such surprising activity, that they skipped from tree to tree almost like birds. They always went naked, had wives in common, but quarrelled about their habitations, fighting with clubs. Circumcision was a rite observed among the Ethiopians, as well as Egyptians, from very early antiquity; though which of these first received it cannot be certainly known. The Ethiopian soldiers tied their arrows round their heads, the feathered part of which touched their foreheads, temples, &c. and the other projected out like so many rays, which formed a kind of crown. Their bows were four cubits long, and required so much strength to manage them, that no other people could make use of them. When they came to a general action with an enemy, they darkened the air with clouding showers of arrows. They retreated fighting, as did the Parthians, discharging volleys of arrows with such dexterity, that, whilst retiring full speed, they dreadfully galled the enemy. Their lances or darts were of immense size, which farther proves their vast strength. The Macrobian (or long-lived Egyptians) fed, for the most part, upon roasted flesh, drank milk, and frequently attained to the age of 120 years, which was said to be owing to a rich and fragrant fountain, wherein they frequently bathed themselves. They looked upon brats as the most valuable of metals, and so little esteemed gold, that they fettered their common prisoners with golden chains. Diodorus asserts, that they kept the bodies of their relations in their houses, within cases of glass; not thinking it right that the knowledge of the features, and likeness of their deceased relations, should be forgotten by their surviving kindred, or concealed from their posterity. Thus much may suffice concerning the manners, customs, &c. of the divers, and, in some respects, very different nations or tribes of the different Ethiopians. Jupiter Ammon, according to the Greek and Latin authors, seems to have been the principal object of religious worship in Ethiopia. Diodorus says they valued themselves on their being the first nation that had a religious establishment. In short, from the general account of authors, their religion differed not much from that of the Egyptians, which is not to be wondered at, considering their vicinity to, and intercourse with, that people. The country is at present inhabited by people of three different religions, viz. Christians, Mahometans, and Pagans; but the last are most numerous, and are generally the Blacks, as the Mahometans are tawney, possessing the north shore: and those who are called Christians have abundance of Pagan and Jewish rites intermixed, and are but small in number compared with the other two. Ethiopia did not abound in cities and towns of any considerable note. Auxeme was its metropolis. It is very mountainous, and most of the hills overlook the clouds. In such a region the air cannot be always alike, and perhaps there is no country in the world where so many different seasons may be found in so small a compass. The Ethiopie, as well as the opposite, coast of the Red Sea, and the islands of this sea, are, in summer, intolerably scorched by the solar rays. However, the air is much more temperate in the mountainous parts. In some provinces the winter is extremely severe; in others as warm as summer in several parts of Europe. They have little or no snow, but frequent and dreadful thunders, that terrify both man and beast, which proceed from the excessive variety of air. The climate, in general, is yet so healthy, that it is still not uncommon for the natives to arrive at 100 years of age. The days and nights in Ethiopia, as lying between the tropic of cancer and the equator, or equinoctial line, are, for the most part, nearly equal; and the soil in those parts capable of cultivation, is extremely fertile, and produces vast quantities of grain, pulse, and fruit. Metals likewise, particularly gold minerals, vegetables, and a surprising variety of animals, abound here. It is asserted they have sometimes two, sometimes three, harvests in a year. They neither sow or mow (to make hay) for the cattle, the perpetual heat, and continual distillation of moisture from the mountains, producing grass in great abundance, and covering the fields with a most beautiful verdure through all the different seasons of the year; yet they are sometimes infested with flights of grasshoppers, which cover the earth, and, in a short time, devour every blade of grass to the very root. Of all the rivers that water Ethiopia, the most famous is the Nile, which has its source in this country. The chief parts and emporiums were Adulis, Mondus, Opone, Morylow, and the principal city of the Avalite, seated upon the Red Sea. The Arabs, from their country, into these places imported fruit, corn, wine, &c. and exported from thence, to Ocelis and Muta, opposite harbours in Arabia, spices, cassia, perfumes, ivory, myrrh, and several other commodities. The civit-cat is one of the most remarkable animals of Ethiopia, which yields the perfume called civet, and is a native of the East-Indies and America, as well as of Africa. It is a sort of wild cat, not much unlike our tame ones, except that the head more resembles that of a fox: their skin is spotted, the claws are less dangerous, and the cry is different. The perfume this animal produces is an unctuous substance, of the consistence of honey, or butter, and has a most fragrant and grateful scent. Civet, like musk, is chiefly used by perfumers and confectioners, having but little place in medicine. The laws of this country allow polygamy, though the church canons forbid it, so that they lawfully, though irreligiously, indulge themselves in it. Trades and manufactures are wholly wanting here; though, indeed, their way of living makes them need the fewer. Even those which are most necessary they are supplied with by the Jews, viz. weaving of stuffs for drets, forging heads for the lances, &c.

EZION-GEBER was a celebrated port-town in the reign of Solomon and Jehoshaphat. From divers texts of Scripture it may be inferred, that Ezion-Geber and Elath were neighbouring places; so that, for the situation of this place, it may suffice to turn to the article Elath. After the division of the kingdom, Edom being of that part which remained to the house of David, they still continued to carry on a trade before established from the two ports of Elath and Ezion-Geber, especially from the latter, which they chiefly made use of till the time of Jehoshaphat. But he having there lost his fleet, which he had prepared to sail to Ophir, in partnership with Abaziah, king of Israel, this spoiled the credit of that harbour. Therefore, to avoid future mischiefs, the station of the king's ships was thenceforth removed to Elath.

G.

GADARA, a city of Palestine, in Cœlo-Syria, situated near the river of its name, where it discharges itself into the lake of Genesareth.

GADILEE, a province in Judea, in which had been situated the tribes of Asher, Naphtali, Zebulun, and and Issachar. It was the most northern part of Palestine, extending beyond the great plain of Jezreel, and was bounded north by Mount Libanus, east by the Jordan and the sea of Galilee, south by the river Chison, and west by the Mediterranean. It was divided into high and low. The former, on the other side Jordan, extending towards the Machonitis, the Libanus, and Batana, was stiled Galilee of the Gentiles, either because mostly inhabited by, or intermixed with, them. Here was seated the half-tribe of Manasseh. The other was richer and more fertile, except in the northernmost part, producing excellent corn, wine, and fruits, with little cultivation, and was, in its flourishing state, full of towns and villages, and extremely populous. The inhabitants were stout and warlike, and very zealous for the Jewish religion. Herein stood Capernaum, Chorazin and Bethsaida.

Gath.

GATH, in Palestine, one of the five cities of the Philistines, was anciently the principal one, as being the royal seat in the middle times of that people, but it dwindled away so early, that there are few or no materials for a description of it. Nor is it easy to fix its exact situation, there being a number of cities of the same name, differently placed by the sacred books, some of them distinguished by an appellative, as Gath-Epher, Gath-Rimmon, &c. and others without any. The word signifies a press, a wine-press, oil-press, or any other. Gath and Ekron are recorded as the boundaries of the Philistine territory, the former on the south, and the latter on the north; and these, with the three between, composed the five satrapies of that brave ancient nation. It must needs have been a very strong populous city, till David took and dismantled it. Rehoboam rebuilt and fortified it. In the days of Amos and Micah, we find it to have been in a flourishing condition, and wholly independent of the kings of Judah, and since then demolished by Hazael, king of Syria. From these various changes it grew to be of little consideration, till, in the time of Christianity, Fulk, king of Jerusalem, built a castle on its ruins. As to the ancient inhabitants of this city and its district, it is evident, from Scripture, that their inveterate enmity towards the Israelites was such, that a learned author says, "one would be almost tempted to think they were created on purpose to be a thorn in the sides of that chosen people." This enmity seems to have been of very ancient date; for, in the first book of Chronicles, we read, that "the man of Gath slew the children of Ephraim, because they came down to take away their cattle, and Ephraim their father mourned many days, &c."

Gaza.

GAZA was the most renowned city of the Philistines, whose gates Sampson took away, and whither he was carried when he was taken, and where he pulled down the house of Dagon on the lords of the Philistines. When it was in its first days cannot be known; but, in time, it became considerable for strength, beauty, and extent. It was situate on an high hill, and flood, as it were, in the very south-west angle or corner of the land of Canaan, upon the skirts of the desert which led to Egypt. In the Hebrew it is called Azza; and Aga by the Syrians, which has been altered into Gaza. In latter times it was also called Ione and Minoa; and the sea which washed along the shore from Gaza to Egypt, was called the Ionian Sea. This city was in the lot of Judah, according to the division made by Joshua; but though it was attempted and carried, yet the Philistines possessed it again, and kept it. For the more convenient communication with the sea, it had a port, called Majuma, a place of no great account, till Constantine took notice of it, and called it Constantia, in honour of his son Constantius. Julian altered its name into the port of Gaza, or maritime part of that city. There is no sign it ever was a commodious place for the reception of shipping, but that it was a mere shift for that purpose. Gaza often groaned under the miseries of war, of which one instance was in the year of the world 2667, when, after a stout resistance, and great slaughter, it was taken by Alexander the Great. Gaza was sometimes in a flourishing state, with mighty walls and costly edifices, and sometimes in a distressed condition. After several vicissitudes, it lay so far neglected, that, in the Acts of the Apostles, it is called desert; that is, such a desert as it is now, we may suppose, weak in inhabitants; for so fertile a spot can never be called by that appellation according to the common acceptation of that word with us. Lucan commemorates Gaza with Tyre and Sidon, when its sister cities are either forgotten, or omitted as not worthy a place among the considerable ones of this part of the coast. Though it is now but a poor place, there are some reliques left, that testify its having been in a better condition; for divers simple roofs are supported with goodly pillars of Parian marble, some plain, some curiously carved. On the summit of the hill are the ruins of the huge arches, sunk low in the earth, and other foundations of a stately building. Majuma, which is the new or present Gaza, retains some monuments of its former grandeur, and is encompassed with fertile vallies, producing great plenty of fruits. Near this city is a round castle, flanked with four square towers, and in good repair. Over against it is the seraglio, where the basha's wives, &c. are kept; and a little above it the remains of an old Roman castle, the materials of which are remarkably firm and hard.

GENESARETH, lake and land. The Lake, called also the Sea of Tiberias, the water of Geneser, and Sea of Galilee, is supposed to have borrowed its name from the city Cinneroth, on its borders, in the tribe of Naphtali. It has great variety of fish, which, for shape and taste, is not to be found any where else. The Jordan runs through the midst of it. The lake takes its name from the country that surrounds it, which is fruitful and agreeable to admiration. As to the fertility of the soil, no plant comes amiss to it; besides that, it is improved, by the skill and industry of the inhabitants, to the highest degree; and, by a climate extraordinarily benign, every thing prospers there, as nuts, palms, figs, and orange-trees, that flourish in perfection, though they require a quite different temperature of air in the nature of them. It is as remarkable for a chrysaline flowing fountain, called by the natives, Capernaum. The length of the country, along the lake, is thirty stadia, or furlongs; and the breadth twenty.

GERAR, a place frequently mentioned in the history of Abraham, was a Philistine city, venerable as being the seat of their first kings; but its exact situation is not to be determined. The usual name of the kings thereof seems to have been Abimelech, as Pharaoh was that of those of Egypt. The kings of Gerar were, in all probability, Philistines by extraction; for the kingdom of Gerar is expressly reckoned within the land of the Philistines.

GESHUR and Maacah kingdoms. From Joshua xiii. 11, 13, it is evident that the cities Geshur and Maacah, the two capitals of these two small kingdoms, lay within the borders of the land of Israel, and consequently on the south side of Mount Libanus. That Geshur and Maacah were the capitals of two kingdoms, is likewise evident from our having express mention made of the king of Geshur, 2 Sam. iii. 3. and of the king of Maacah, 2 Sam. x. 6. How these two cities or kingdoms lay, in respect to one another, is not to be determined; but it is certain they both lay in the north part of the half tribe of Manasseh, or the east of Jordan. Geshur was a kingdom before Damascus; and Nicolaus Damascenes writes that Abraham was king (i. e. ruler) there.

GIBEAH lay to the north of Jerusalem, according to modern geographers, about seven or eight miles; and as many from Gibeon, north-west. It stood on an hill, as the name imports. It is, in Scripture, called Gibeah of Benjamin, as belonging to that tribe; and Gibeah of Saul, as being not only his native place, but that of his royal seat. It was here that the concubine of the the Levite was abused, the consequence of which is very remarkable, and was very fatal. St. Jerome tells us it was totally ruined in his time.

GIBEON, the capital of the ancient Gibeonites, and a city of the Hivites, was distant about seven miles north from Jerusalem, and situated on an eminence, as its name properly imports. From Joshua x. 2. we learn, that it was a great city, greater than Ai. Eusebius and Jerome tells us, it was a regal city; though we nowhere read of a king of Gibeon; whereby it seems to be implied, that, though it was not a regal city, it was, in reality, as considerable. As to the city itself, Eusebius farther tells us, that it was a town or village in his time, still going under its old name, four miles west from Bethel.

GIHON. It is not agreed whether it be a mountain or a fountain. Its situation is generally assigned to be near mount Sion, and on the west side thereof. It was at this Gihon that Solomon, by the especial order of David, was anointed king over Israel; and this is thought to carry in it some inducement to suppose that Gihon was a fountain; David making choice of this fountain for anointing Solomon in opposition to his other son, Adonijah, who was at that time setting up for king near Ennogel, i. e. the well or fountain of Rogel, on another side of Jerusalem.

GILEAD, or Galaad, mount, lies on the east of the sea of Galilee, being part of the ridge of mountains running from mount Lebanon, and including the mountainous region called Trachonites. It had its name from the occasion of the heap made with stones by Laban and Jacob, Galaad or Gilead signifying the heap of witnesses. From this name given to the heap of stones, the whole mountainous track hereabouts was afterwards so called. Hence we read of some places lying in this track or country, that were distinguished by the name of Gilead being added to them, as Jabesh-Gilead and Ramoth-Gilead. The word Gilead seems, in some places of Scripture, to denote, if not all, the greatest part of the country beyond Jordan, viz. all the half tribe of Manasseh, and the tribe of Gad.

GILGAL is situated between Jordan and Jericho. Jerome says that the place was shewn in his days at two miles distance from Jericho, and was held in very great veneration by the inhabitants of that country.

GISCHALA was a town in Galilee, and the last therein reduced by Titus. Of this city was that famed John from this place named John of Gischala, who headed one of the parties of the zealots who defended Jerusalem against the Romans, but, at the same time, committed all manner of the most execrable outrages, and brought on the Jews innumerable calamities.

GREECE. The limits of all Greece extended from north to south, i. e. from the long ridge of mountains which divided it from Macedonia, and from the river Strymon, by which it was parted from Thrace, to the promontory of Tenarus, the utmost southern extent of Peloponnesus; and from east to west from the Ionian to the Ægean Sea. It contained a great number of kingdoms, all of which have, at one time or other, been governed by kings of their own, whose names we only find occasionally mentioned in the history of the more considerable kingdoms of Argos, Attica, Thebes, and Sparta, of the Argonautic expedition, and of the Trojan war. From the names of Graioi and Graicoi, they were soon changed into those of Achæi and Hellones, by which they are generally called in ancient authors. It is supposed, and with some foundation, that Javan, the son of Japhet, and his descendants, were the first who peopled these countries. If we look upon the infant state of Greece with respect to its inhabitants, it appears, even by the confession of their own writers, to have been one continued, uncultivated desert, inhabited by men living indifferently on every fruit, herb, or root that came in their way, and lying either in the open fields, or, at best, sheltering themselves from the inclemency of the weather in dens, clefts, and hollow trees. Laws they had none, except that of the strongest arm; so that those who were most pleasantly or fruitfully situated, were continually liable to be dispossessed by new invaders. Hence it was that Greece was in a continual fluctuation, the weakest being always sure to be turned out by the strongest. Hence it is also, that whilst other nations, as the Jews, Egyptians, Medianites, and Phœnicians, had improved the useful arts to a very great degree, as seen in their several histories, the Greeks alone seem to have been the only strangers to them, inasmuch that one may reasonably question, from Homer's making oxen the standard of the value of things, whether they knew the use of money even in his days. They had no letters till Cadmus brought them thither out of Phœnicia, whose alphabet consisting only of sixteen letters, was not perfected into that of twenty-four till many centuries after him. It was from him likewise that they learned arithmetic, navigation, and commerce. As for other sciences, they continued much longer strangers to them; and it was not till some of their great men began to travel into Egypt, and other kingdoms, that they began to have some relish for them. Their religion was little less than a corruption (if we may be allowed the word) of the Egyptian theology, brought thither at first by Cecrops, an Egyptian exile, and founder of the Attic monarchy. Thus Greece soon after was furnished with a number of deities, suited to the taste of their brutal votaries, and with a sanction and precedent for every unsocial and unnatural vice. To this desperate and universal degeneracy of the Grecian nation, we may venture to ascribe, in some measure, all the fabulous accounts which the poets have given us concerning the birth, extraction, and extravagant exploits of those famous heroes, who bellowed so much pains and time to reform and abolish it. Of this number were Minos, Hercules, Theseus, and many more, some of whom cleared the seas, others the land, of that pestilent race: and others, lastly, by wholesome laws, by the introduction of commerce, arts and sciences, laid the happy foundation for that politeness and grandeur for which they were so justly famed in after ages. Greece (at present called Rumelia by the Turks) is generally considered a temperate, healthful country, and fruitful soil; but has had most of the cities it contained destroyed by the barbarous Turks, and a deluge of ignorance introduced into the once admired seats of learning and politeness. Greece, or Rumelia, abounds with fine corn, charming wine, delicious fruits, and great herds of cattle, with fowls and venison in great plenty. The Christian religion was planted in this country, soon after the death of Our Saviour, by St. Paul and Timothy; and it flourished here, for many ages, with more purity than in the western church, producing many champions for the faith, and venerable fathers, whose writings convey to us the doctrine and discipline of the church very near in its native purity. But since the Turks have been masters of this country, and made the people slaves, the state of their religion has very much declined. The Greeks are in their manners much like the Turks: they are covetous, perfidious, treacherous, revengeful to the highest degree, very superstitious, and great hypocrites; and, indeed, are so despised by the Turks, that they value not a Greek who even turns Mahometan. The ancient language of Greece is still known to us, being preserved in the writings of their famous philosophers, historians, orators, and poets. But the modern Greek is so far changed by the mixture of foreign languages, that it differs extremely from the ancient, which is but little understood by the present inhabitants.

H.

HAMATH probably adjoined to Rehob north; and, from a clause in the book of Numbers, it seems plainly denoted that Rehob was that part of Canaan as joined next to the country or kingdom of Hamath. It is generally thought that the city of Hamath was the same called by the Greeks Epiphania, the situation of which agrees very well with what is here observed. So that it may be inferred, that the kingdom of Hamath extended itself from the land of Canaan, or more particularly from the kingdom of Rehob, southward, to the city Epiphania northward; and from the coast of the Mediterranean Sea, west, to the kingdom of Damascus (or Syria more particularly called) east. This kingdom is frequently denoted in Scripture by the land of Hamath, and herein lay Riblah; 2 Kings xxiii. 33. and as the extent of the land of Israel is frequently denoted by this expression, "from Dan unto Beer-sheba," and Numb. xiii. 21. "from the wilderness of Zin unto Rehob," so, 1 Kings viii. 65, it is denoted by this expression, "from the entering in of Hamath, unto the river of Egypt:" and in like manner, in another place, "from the entering in of Hamath, unto the sea of the plain."

Hareth. HARETH Forest, whither David retired, was evidently within the tribe of Judah, by the words of the prophet, 1 Sam. xxii. 5.

Hebron. HEBRON, or Chebron, was a very ancient city. Some think it was built 90 years after the flood, and that it claimed precedency even of Memphis. It was seated in the hilly country, in the south part of Canaan, and is famous in Scripture on many accounts, but now is almost in ruins. Near the ruined old city stands a village, called Elkahil, in which is still an handsome church, built by Helena, over the cave where the old patriarchs were buried. It is, indeed, turned into a mosque, and held in great esteem by the Turks as well as Christians. Hebron, or Elkahil, inconsiderable as it is, is still the capital of a district, called "The territory of the friends of God," consisting of about twenty-five other villages.

Helam. HELAM, the place where the Israelites and Syrians engaged in battle, and the latter received a mighty overthrow, is thought to have been the same with Almatha, mentioned by Ptolemy in the reign of Trachonitis.

Heliopolis. HELIOPOLIS, i. e. the city of the Sun, was a name given to several Greek cities, and, amongst the rest, to Corinth.

Hermon. HERMON Mount. There are two of the name mentioned in Scripture. First, the north-east part of Lebanon, adjoining to the Holy Land, is distinguished by the name of Mount Hermon, which is consequently mentioned as the north boundary of the country beyond Jordan, particularly the kingdom of Og, or of the half tribe of Manasseh, east of Jordan. Second, Hermon lies within the land of Canaan, west of the river Jordan, not far from mount Tabor. This Hermon is, like Libanus, capped with snow, but for nothing so remarkable as for the abundant dews which fall upon and about it. A traveller of note observes, that "he was sufficiently instructed by experience what the holy Psalmist means by the dew of Hermon, as the tents were as wet with it as if it had rained all night."

Herodion. HERODION. Herod the Great built a stately palace about seven miles from Jerusalem, in the place where he had formerly defeated the Parthians and the Jews of the Asmonean party, when he fled from that city on Antigonus becoming master of it. This, from his own name, he called Herodion. It stood in a very pleasant and strong situation, on the top of a hill, from whence was a prospect of all the country round. From this palace the hill declined all round with an equal and uniform descent, which made a beautiful shew; and at the foot of it were soon built such a number of houses, as amounted to the proportion of a considerable city.

Heishbon. HESHBON, the capital of the kingdom of Sihon, appertained to the tribe of Reuben, but stood in the confines of that of Gad, and was remarkable for its excellent fish-pools. After the carrying away of the ten tribes, it was re-possessed by the Moabites, whence, in the prophecies of Isaiah and Jeremiah against Moab, we find frequent mention of it. It has been a Levitical city. It continued a great and noble city till the days of Eusebius and Jerome, being by the Greeks called Esbus.

HYRCANIA, a province of Persia, was bounded on the north by the Caspian Sea, on the west by Media, on the south by Parthia, and on the east by Margiana, now called Mazandran. The capital was called Hyrcania, as well as the province, and is by the moderns denominated Hyrcan. Ancient writers agree in representing Hyrcania as a country abounding in wine, wheat, figs, and all other kinds of fruit, but here and there interspersed with meadows and pasture lands, and in some places with the less pleasant prospect of thick woods, abounding with wild beasts almost of every kind. As to its present condition, nothing can be more amazing than the wide difference between the accounts given us by persons of credit and capacity, who have had equal opportunities of acquiring a perfect knowledge of the particulars they represent.

J.

JABESH-GILEAD. That this place lay in Gilead, is imported by the name. It joined to the country of the Ammonites. It was still a town in the days of Eusebius and Jerome, six miles from Pella, on a hill, in the way to Gerasa. Its inhabitants are remarked in Scripture for their grateful remembrance of Saul's having raised the siege thereof by the Ammonites.

JAMNIA, in Judea, stands a few miles from Joppa on the same coast. It is famed in the book of the Maccabees, and placed at about 290 furlongs from Jerusalem, and was an episcopal see, under that of Cesarea; but it is now in so ruinous a state, that scarce any thing remains of it worth farther notice.

JERICHO, in Canaan, about six miles west from the river of Jordan, and 23 almost east of Jerusalem, was the first city that was invaded by the Israelites, after their passage over Jordan, and, by the miraculous fall of its walls, taken, set on fire, and levelled with the ground. The tree from which flowed the famed Balm of Gilead, and other odoriferous trees likewise, grew in its vicinity, from the fragrant of which it is supposed to be named Jericho, which, in the original, signifies odour. Here Elisha sweetened the waters of the spring that supplied it and the neighbouring countries. Here Herod built a sumptuous palace. It was the dwelling-place of Zaccheus, and honoured with Christ's own presence and miracles. It yielded to none in all Judea but Jerusalem, in the times of the last kings thereof. Besides the palace aforesaid, it was adorned with an hippodrome, an amphitheatre, and other magnificent buildings. But at present, according to modern travellers, it is only a poor village of the Arabs.

JERUSALEM. This famous city has been so amply described by our author, together with the various revolutions it underwent, from its foundation to its destruction, in the second year of the emperor Vespasian, that a recapitulation of them would be both tedious and unnecessary. We therefore proceed to observe, as to its more modern state, that, in A. D. 136, the emperor Adrian, having changed the name of Jerusalem into Ælia Capitolina, after a name (Ælius) of his own family, erected a temple to Jupiter Capitolinus upon the spot where the Jewish temple formerly stood, and planted a Roman colony in the city; whereupon the Jews broke out into a rebellion, took Jerusalem, and massacred all the Romans settled there. But Severus (governor of Britain) being sent against the rebels, retook the city, reduced it to ashes, and plowed up the ground whereon the temple had stood. The emperor and senate of Rome published an edict, forbidding all Jews for ever, upon pain of death, to set foot in Jerusalem, or or any place where it might be so much as seen. Even those Jews that embraced Christianity were also prohibited. This quite delivered the church from the servitude of the law; for, till then, the bishops of Jerusalem had often been chosen from among the circumcised Christians, who joined the observance of the law to that of the gospel. Adrian, however, next year, ordered Jerusalem, by the said name of Ælia, to be rebuilt, and peopled it, partly by a Roman colony, and partly by such of the neighbouring people as were not Jews. Hereby the church at Jerusalem became to be composed only of converted Gentiles, or Christians proper, St. Mark being appointed the bishop of the place. Constantine the Great afterwards demolished the heathen temples built by Adrian here; and he and his mother Helena (of British extraction) built sumptuous churches in their stead, and other magnificent structures. A. D. 614, the city was taken by the Persians, and continued in their hands, and those of the Saracens and Mahometans, till the reign of Charlemagne, to whom it was yielded by the king of Persia. After his death it was retaken, and held by those infidels till the year 1099, when Godfrey of Bouillon took it from them, and was made its king. A. D. 1187, Saladin, the famed king of Syria and Egypt, made himself master of it, and of all the Holy Land. Last of all it fell into the hands of the Turks, and so it yet continues.

Jerusalem, in its present state, is about three miles in circumference, and lies in 31 deg. 50 min. north lat. and 36 deg. east long. being situated on a rocky mountain. Dr. Banks, in his excellent System of Geography, says, "The hills which stand about Jerusalem make it appear to be situated, as it were, in an amphitheatre, whose area inclineth to the eastward. We have no where, as I know of, any distinct view of it: that from the Mount of Olives, which is the least, and, perhaps, the farthest, is, notwithstanding, at so small a distance, that when Our Saviour was there, he might be said, almost in a literal sense, to have wept over it. There are very few remains of the city, either as it was in Our Saviour's time, or as it was afterwards rebuilt by Adrian, scarce one stone being left upon another. Even the very situation is altered; for Mount Sion, the most eminent part of the Old Jerusalem, is now excluded, and its ditches filled up; whilst the places adjoining to Mount Calvary, where Christ is said to have suffered without the gate, are now almost in the centre of the city." With respect to its present state, the Turks call it Cudsembaric. It is thinly inhabited: the walls are weak, and without bastions; the ditch inconsiderable. The gates are six in number, viz. Damascus, St. Stephen's, Herod's, Serquilina, Bethlehem, and Mount Sion Gate; beside the Golden Gate, which is shut up, on account of a prophecy which the Turks have among them, that by that gate the Christians are to take Jerusalem. The streets are narrow, and the houses mean. Pilgrims and travellers, who flock from all parts, either through devotion or out of curiosity, are the principal support of the city. A Turkish bassa resides here, to keep good order, collect the Grand Seignior's revenues, and protect the pilgrims from the insults of the Arabs. No European Christian is permitted to enter the city till the requisites duties are discharged; nor can a stranger safely stay here, without being upon good terms with the Latin fathers. The pilgrims principal object is the church of the Holy Sepulchre, situated upon Mount Calvary. It is 100 paces in length, and 60 in breadth. The workmen were obliged to reduce the hill to a plain area, in order to lay the foundation: but great precaution was used not to alter any part of it where our Saviour's Passion was concerned. The scene of the Crucifixion is left entire, being about 12 yards square, and stands at this day so much higher than the floor of the church, that it is ascended to by 21 steps. The Holy Sepulchre, which was originally a cave hewn out in the bottom of the rock, may be now compared to a grotto standing above ground, and having the rock cut away, and levelled all round. The walls of the church of the Holy Sepulchre are of stone, and the roof of cedar. The east end encloses Mount Calvary, and the west the Holy Sepulchre: the former is covered with a superb cupola, supported by 16 large columns, and open at top. Over the altar there is another fine dome: the nave constitutes the choir; and the sides of the church contain the most remarkable places where the circumstances of Our Saviour's Passion were transacted, together with the tombs of Godfrey and Baldwin, the two first Christian kings of Jerusalem. In the church of the Crucifixion the hole is shewn where it is said the cross was fixed. The altar has three crosses, richly adorned, on it, particularly with four lamps of immense value, which are kept constantly burning. The cloister round the sepulchre is divided into sundry chapels. The Latins, who take care of the church, have apartments on the north-west side; but they are never suffered to go out, the Turks keeping the keys, and furnishing them with provisions through a wicket. Some grand ceremonies are performed at Easter, representing Christ's passion, crucifixion, death, and resurrection. At dusk the pilgrims and monks meet in the chapel of the apparition: the lights are extinguished, and a sermon preached by one of the Latin priests: then each being furnished with a lighted taper, all walk in procession round the church. They stop first at the Pillar of Flagellation, where an hymn is sung, and a sermon preached: thence they proceed to the Chapel of the Prison, to hear another hymn, and another sermon. At the Chapel of the Division of the Garment, to which they go next, an hymn is sung, but no sermon preached. They then proceed to the Chapel of Desecration, the altar of which is supported by two pillars; and underneath is a piece of greyish marble, on which they say the soldiers placed Christ when they crowned him with thorns, and mocked him, saying, "Hail, king of the Jews!" Here a sermon is preached, and a fourth hymn is sung. They next enter another chapel, parted from the former only by a curtain, and advancing to the east end, come to the very spot on which Our Redeemer was crucified. This chapel is covered all over with Mosaic work; and in the middle of the pavement are some marble stones of several colours, designed to shew the very place where Our Lord's blood fell, when his hands and feet were pierced: it is adorned with 13 lamps, and a candlestick with 12 branches. An hymn is here sung, and a sermon preached on some text relative to the Passion. Then two friars, who personate Joseph of Arimathea and Nicodemus, come with great solemnity to the cross, and take down the image that resembles Christ, which they put in a winding sheet, carry it to the stone of unction, and sing an hymn over it. A sermon is then preached in Arabic, and thus the ceremonials conclude. On Mount Moriah, in the south part of the city, stands an edifice called Solomon's Temple, which is situated upon the same spot as the ancient temple; but it is uncertain by whom it was erected. The middle part, where the Jewish Sanctum Sanctorum was supposed to have stood, is converted into a Turkish mosque. The priests, and other Christians, are kept miserably poor by the tyranny of the government, and have scarce any subsistence, but what they procure by accommodating strangers with food and lodging. The royal sepulchres, without the walls of Jerusalem, are some of the most elaborate, curious, and magnificent antique remains that imagination can conceive. By whom they were built is uncertain, but they consist of a great number of apartments, most of which are spacious, all cut out of the marble rock. Near Jerusalem is a spot of ground, of 30 yards long, and 50 broad, which is now the burial place of the Armenians. It was formerly the aceldama, field of blood, or potter's field, purchased with the price of Judas's treason, as a place of interment for strangers. It is walled round, to prevent the Turks from abusing the bones of the Christians: but one half of it is occupied by a charnel house. The most remarkable places round about Jerusalem, are Mounts Olivet, Calvary, and Gihon; the vallies of Jehoshaphat, Hinnone, and Rephaim; and the towns of Nebo, Gibeon, Gibeah, Gilgal, Bethel, and Jericho.

Joppa.

JOPPA, or Jaffa, as it is at present called, is situated on the Mediterranean coast. It was anciently the principal sea-port town to Jerusalem and all Judea, and the place where the cedars of Lebanon, brought in floats from Tyre for building the temple, were landed. It was pleasantly seated on a rock, in a beautiful plain, and situated in 30 deg. 20 min. north latitude, and 35 deg. 3 min. east longitude. Jonas here embarked for Nineveh: and from the history of his miraculous voyage, the story of Andromeda was fabricated by the heathen poets: for their sea-monster was no other than the Leviathan of the sacred writings, and the whale of the moderns.

—“ Huge Leviathan unwieldy moves,
“ And thro’ the waves ■ living island roves :
“ In dreadful pastime terribly he sports,
“ And the vast ocean scarce his weight supports :
— Where’er he turns, the hoary deeps divide;
“ He breaths a tempest, and he spouts a tide.”

BROOME.

We cannot help adding the sublime description given by Job of this tremendous creature, which the ancients so terribly dreaded, and which the moderns have found the means not only to subdue, but to render subservient to many domestic uses.

“ His bulk is charg’d with such a furious soul,
“ That clouds of smoak from his spread nostrils “ roll
“ As from a furnace; and, when rous’d his ire, “ Fate issues from his jaws in streams of fire.
“ The rage of tempest, and the roar of seas,
“ This great superior of the ocean please.
“ Strength on his ample shoulders sits in state;
“ His well-join’d limbs are dreadfully complete.
“ His flakes of solid flesh are slow to part :
“ As steel his nerves, as adamant his heart.
“ Large is his front; and, when his burnish’d eyes
“ Lift their broad lids, the morning seems to rise.
“ His pastimes, like a cauldron, boil the flood,
“ And blacken ocean with the rising mud :
“ The billows feel him as he works his way,
“ His hoary footsteps shine along the sea.”

Dr. YOUNG’S Job.

It was in Joppa that St. Peter raised Dorcas to life, and received the messengers of Cornelius. Though it was anciently a very magnificent town, and a great commercial mart, yet the harbour was never commodious, on account of several rocks, which render the passage into it dangerous. It lay for many ages in ruins, but of late hath been much improved, though it still falls beneath its original splendor. The lower ground towards the sea is covered with good houses, chiefly of stone. The principal commodities are Ramah and Jerusalem soap. Rice, and other articles, are brought from Egypt, and exported from hence to various places, which yields the bazaar of Gaza a considerable annual income. The inhabitants are supplied with water from an excellent spring on the west side of the town. The Christians now have no church, except one almost in ruins, and uncovered; but they have several handsome houses appropriated to their use, and for the entertainment of pilgrims. Jaffa at present, on the Mediterranean coast, was the head sea-port town to Jerusalem, and all Judea, where the timber of Lebanon, brought in floats from Tyre for building the temple, was landed; it being near about thirty miles north-west from Jerusalem, very pleasantly situated on a rock, in a beautiful plain. It is said to have been first built by Japhet, and from him takes its name Japho, since moulded into Joppa; and heathen geographers speak of it as very ancient. It was famed, in the time of the Maccabees, for the Jews burning the Syrian fleet before it. Its name is now pronounced and written Jaffa, or Japha; and though it has nothing left of its ancient beauty, but its charming prospect, yet its condition appears much amended since Sir Paul Lucas was here in 1707. At present the lower ground, towards the sea, is covered with good houses, mostly stone; and the town carries on a considerable traffic. Great quan-

ties of rice, and other commodities, are brought from Egypt. Ships of burthen can conveniently ride in the road; and on the west side, near the shore, ■ charming spring of water supplies the town. The Christians have here no church but one, almost ruined and uncovered; but they have commodious houses to entertain pilgrims.

JORDAN (River), rising from the lake of Phiala, enters the Samachonite lake, whence proceeding, it ^{Jordan} divides the Sea of Tiberias, and thence discharges itself into the Dead Sea. The origin of its name, or names, is somewhat obscure. It being by far the principal stream in those parts, is, by way of eminence, called “ The River;” the rest in the country being comparatively mere brooks. It is remarkable, that, in harvest-time, it is most full, and apt to overflow its banks, contrary to the general nature of rivers, which are fullest in winter; whence it may have been that some have imagined ■ subterranean communication between this and the Nile. The Jordan, from the accounts of modern travellers, seems very different from what it was formerly. Its stream is so strong and rapid, that a man cannot stem it in swimming: the dimensions are by no means large; and the water is turbid, the natural consequence of its rapidity. It is very wholesome, and incorruptible in its nature; was formerly fordable in some places, and may still be so. It seems also to have been formerly crossed in boats and ferries.

K.

KEILAH is reckoned among the cities of Judah; ^{Kelah} and it appears, from several circumstances, that it lay on that part of Judah which adjoined the country of the Philistines.

KIRJATH-JEARIM, very often mentioned in Scrip- ^{Kirjath} ^{arim} ture, is expressly reckoned in Joshua among the cities of the tribe of Judah, and said to lay in the north border of that tribe, not far from Bethshemesh. It had its name from Mount Jearim, on or near which it lay.

L.

LIBANUS, or Lebanon, the most considerable ^{Liban} mountain in Cœlo Syria, or between Syria and Palestine, is of prodigious height, as well as extent. The cedars of Lebanon are frequently mentioned in Scripture, the few of which now standing are near ■ monastery, called Canobine, about ten hours journey from Tripolis. These cedar trees bear leaves much resembling our juniper, and are green all the year: but in the large ones the top spreads itself into a perfect round; whereas the smaller ascends in form of a pyramid, and like the cypress. They bear the usual fruit, which is ■ kind of large apple, like that of the pine, only smother, and of a browner colour. Various varieties, and singular benign qualities, are attributed to the wood of this tree.

LYDDA lay north, not far off, but somewhat more inland, from Joppa. It was called Diospolis by the Gentiles: but, from the Christians, in the time of the Holy War, it had the name of St. George’s, principally from a very erroneous opinion that St. George had there suffered martyrdom; and they also made it, on that mistaken account, an episcopal see. ^{Lydda}

M.

MADIAN is the Modiana of Ptolemy, and Midian, or Madian, of Scripture, and was a city ^{Mada} of Arabia, at present little better than an heap of ruins, situate on the east shore of the Sea Al Kolzum, at no great distance from the gulph of Ailah. Most authors agree that the Midianites ought to be looked upon as the descendants of Abraham by Keturah, who was afterwards seen to have coalesced with the Ishmaelites, since Moses names the same merchants, who sold Joseph to Potiphar, in one place Ishmaelites, and in another Midianites.

MAHANAIM

Mahannaim. MAHANAIM (i. e. two camps or hosts) was situate between Mount Gilead and the River Jabbak, not far from the latter. By this were the confines of the tribe of Gad and half tribe of Manasseh, that were on the east of Jordan. It became a place of great strength, and therefore seems to have been chosen by Abner for the royal seat of Ishbosheth during the war between him and David; and for the like reason it seems to have been made choice of for the retiring place of David during the rebellion of Absalom.

Makkedah. MAKKEDAH is reckoned among the cities given to Judah. It stood eight miles to the east of Eleutheropolis.

Maon. MAON (into the wilderness of which David withdrew from that of Ziph) was a neighbouring town to Carmel. Hence it is said of Nabal, (1 Sam. xxv. 2.) "There was a man in Maon, whose possessions were in Carmel;" and Nabal, though he might dwell in Maon, is yet stiled Nabal the Carmelite, from the place where his estate lay.

Marah. MARAH. A certain traveller informs us, that, in passing from Shur towards Mount Sinai, they came into the desert, as it is still called, of Marah, where the Israelites met with those bitter waters, or waters of Marah. And this circumstance did not happen till after they wandered three days in the wilderness, we may probably fix it at Corondel, where is a small rill of water, which, though diluted by the dews and rains, still continues to be brackish.

Massada. MASSADA, in the tribe of Judah, was a famous fortress, built by Judas Maccabeus, and represented as impregnable. It was situated on an high, craggy rock, inaccessible on all sides but one, and that very steep and difficult. The siege of it by the Romans under Silva, the general of Titus, is one of the most remarkable events in ancient history. Notwithstanding the height and ruggedness of the rock it stood on, yet, when you had gained the top, you saw an agreeable flat, fertile country, so spacious as to supply the town with corn, fruit, &c. Herod the Great, finding it a place of such strength and importance, added new works and fortifications; and as it had no other supply of water than from the clouds, he ordered several capacious cisterns to receive it, and stored it with a prodigious quantity of provisions of all sorts. He likewise built himself a sumptuous palace in it, that, in case any revolt should happen, he might take refuge in a place so well fortified. The Romans called it Collis Achilea.

Media. MEDIA, now the north-east part of Persia, but once the seat of a potent empire, plainly derived its name from Madai, the third son of Japhet; the Medes in Scripture being constantly called Madai. In modern terms it may be said to be the same country where are now the provinces called Aran, Schirevar, and Adzerbayan, with their sub-divisions.

Megiddo. MEGIDDO appertained to the half tribe of Manasseh on the west of Jordan; but the Canaanites continued to dwell therein tributary to the Israelites. Solomon rebuilt it. Here died Ahaziah and Josiah, kings of Judah.

Melitene. MELITENE, or Melitina, in Lesser Armenia, was a Roman castle, with a garrison, which the emperor Trajan made a city, appointing it to be the metropolis of the whole country, whence, in process of time, it became one of the most populous and wealthy cities in the east. It stood on the banks of the Euphrates. The famous thundering legion belonged to this place, being raised and generally quartered here.

Memphis. MEMPHIS is called in Scripture Moph and Noph, which name is supposed to be derived from Anfenophis, according to Sir Isaac Newton, the same person with Menes and Memnon, a prince that either built or fortified it. The chief idol of the Egyptians was here called Apis, which they worshipped.

shipped in the shape of a bull, and always kept one in his temple. The famous city of Cairo is said to have been built out of its ruins, on the eastern side of the Nile.

Michmash. MICHMASH, in Judea, was in the tribe of Benjamin, situated nine miles from Jerusalem, and between it and Gibeon. Eusebius says it was very considerable in his time.

Mygdonia. MYGDONIA, or more properly Macedonia, is thought, by the learned, to be plainly denoted in the first book of Maccabees by the land of Chettim, Alexander being mentioned as coming from thence. Perseus, king of Macedonia, is therein also called king of the Citims. But as this country was anciently inhabited by various nations, so was it, for a long succession of ages, distinguished by different appellations. It was very anciently called Amathia; but afterwards the whole country, which the Greeks called Macedonia, received that denomination, as some say, from king Macedo, descended from Deucalion; or, according to others, by an early change of Mygdonia, the name of one of its provinces, into Macedonia. The accessions of territory which Macedonia received, were made at different times, and on account of different wars. Pliny tells us, that no less than 150 different nations were seated within its territory; and Mela confirms the multitude of different states, by saying, it had about as many nations as cities. Its form was irregular; but its situation excellent, in respect to its being washed on the east by the Ægean Sea, and on the west by the Ionian, which advantages, however, were never cultivated as they might have been; nor were the Macedonians ever powerful at sea, though many noble bays and excellent harbours are to be found in their country. Macedonia abounded with most sorts of trees which were valuable for timber, fruit, or shade. It had anciently many wastes and deserts. In process of time no part of Europe was better peopled, but since it has been in the hands of the Turks, great part lies uninhabited. It is rich in divers mines of gold; abounds with corn, pasture, cattle, venison; and, in some parts, produces wine and oil.

N.

Nabathæa. NABATHÆA. According to St. Jerome, the country of the Nabathæans extended from the Euphrates to the Red Sea; so that it comprehended Arabia Deserta, and great part of Arabia Petræa. The manners and customs of these people were much the same as those of Arabia, Ethiopia, &c. &c.

Naim. NAIM, or Nain, according to Eusebius, was a city situated in the plain near Mount Tabor, and within two miles of it. He places it at a small distance from Endor and Scythopolis. There was another city so called in Idumea, where Simon, the son of Gorias, made his retreat after he had strongly fortified it.

Naioth. NAIOTH (to which Samuel retired with David) is situated in Ramah, meaning the district of Ramah, otherwise called Ramathaim Zophim, the birth-place, and usual residence, of the said great prophet.

Neapolis. NEAPOLIS, a city of note in Thrace, on the Ægean Sea, between the river Strymon and the Nestus, the name signifying only New City. One of the quarters of Syracuse was so called.

Neopolis. NEOPOLIS, in Judea. Neopolis, in Armenia Minor, was built by Pompey, in memory of a signal victory over Tigranes the Great, and thence called Neopolis Pompeii.

Nineveh. NINEVEH, or Ninus, in Assyria, (now Curdistan,) is most generally supposed to have been at first built by Nimrod, not long after the Tower of Babel. Its name is generally thought to be taken from Nenes, the son of Nimrod, and to be a compound, Neni-nave, Neni-nave, i. e. The Dwelling of Ninus. It was seated on the banks of the Tigris, over against where Mæul now stands, and had increased and grown so prodigiously large in the time of Jonas, who prophesied against it, that it was three days journey long, or, as others think, in circumference. It was also so strong as to be esteemed impregnable. However, it was at length taken and destroyed, according to the prophecy of Nahum: and it is remarkable that Lucian, in one of his dialogues, says, that Ninus (the prophane name of Nineveh) was so utterly destroyed, that there remained no footsteps of it, nor could one tell so much as where once it stood." A new city, it is probable, was quickly built by the Medes, out of the ruins of the old, and called New Nineveh; but this was likewise destroyed by Astyages, the eighth Median king from Arbaces, for its frequent revolts: and to so low a degree was it brought in the time of Cyril, bishop of Alexandria, in the middle of the fifth century, that he tells us there was nothing to be seen of it but great heaps of rubbish: and yet we find a third Nineveh destroyed by the Saracens, as it is supposed, some hundred years after. At a small distance from the ruins of Nineveh is a Turkish mosque.

Nisibis.

NISIBIS was once a large, populous, and opulent city; but is at present described as a town in Diarbeker, about 35 miles from the Tigris, and but the shadow of what it once was; though it is still the residence of a Turkish Sangiac. In fine, it is little more than a village; though arches, gates, and the remains of a noble church, are yet to be seen. Its territory is fruitful, and, when cultivated, produces corn, wine, and various fruits, the chief business being agriculture. About two miles to the east is a good river, with a very noble stone bridge: and all the way between the town and it, pieces of old walls, and a large arch, whereby it is supposed the city anciently reached quite to that river. Nisibis stands west from the celebrated Ur of the Chaldees, between it and the Tigris.

Nob.

Nob was a sacerdotal city. By the prophet Nehemiah it is reckoned among the cities of Benjamin. It seems, therefore, to have been added to the priests, and that occasionally, when the ark was at Kirjath-jearim, it being moreover not nominated among those that were assigned to them at first.

Nod.

NOD, the land of, to which fugitive Cain, under an apprehension that every one who found him would slay him, by divine order, retired, and therein built a city, calling it Enoch, after the name of his son. Where this land of Nod (which word signifies fugitive or wandering) was situate, is thought not quite certain. No remains of the name Nod itself, ■ a land, are now to be found.

O.

Olivet.

OLIVET Mount, or the Mount of Olives, called, by the Jews, in their language, the Mount of Unction, or the Mount of Olives, or Oil. It was also termed the Mountain of Three Lights, because lighted on the west by the fire of the altar, receiving on the east the light of the sun, and producing much oil, the aliment of light. It stands a sabbath day's journey (i. e. eight furlongs, or one mile) east from Jerusalem, commanding an extensive prospect, as being the loftiest eminence in its neighbourhood. It was once famous for fertility, and was thus described by an author of the 7th century. "Few or no trees are there to be found, except the olive and vine, according to the report of Acculfus; but wheat and barley there flourish in ■ most kindly manner, for the nature of the soil is quite productive." With respect to the Turks, notwithstanding their pretended veneration for this mount and its circumstances, it is more than suspected it is not out of real devotion, but for lucre's sake, and to exact money from the popish pilgrims, and travellers of curiosity, for admission to see them.

OPHIR. The acutest, nicest, and most sagacious writers are much at a loss to find out ■ certain settlement for Ophir. It is by several supposed to be the place whither Solomon sent ships every three years from Ezim-geba to fetch gold. This opinion some would have supported by several edifices, which seem to have been erected here by foreigners, as they have inscriptions in unknown characters. Besides, some say the inhabitants boast of having books, proving that the Israelites, in Solomon's time, sailed every third year to these ports to fetch gold.

P.

PALESTINE, or Judæa, is situated between 31 deg. 30 min. and 32 deg. 20 min. north lat. and from 34 deg. 50 min. to 37 deg. 15 min. east long. being bounded by the Mediterranean sea on the west, Syria and Phœnicia on the north, Arabia Deserta on the east, and Arabia Petræa on the south. It is therefore near 200 miles in length, and about 80 in breadth towards the middle, but increases or diminishes 12 or 15 miles in other places. The longest day is about 14 hours 15 minutes. The air of Judæa is the most salubrious and pleasant imaginable; neither heat or cold are felt in the extreme, but an agreeable serenity diffuses itself throughout the year, which puts the stranger in mind of the golden age:

"The flowers unsown in fields and meadows
"reign'd,
"And western winds immortal spring main-
"tain'd."

Though the climate of this country is at present the most admirable in the universe, we have no doubt but that, in the early ages of the world, when the pastoral life was the most honourable, and agriculture the most respected employ, it even exceeded its present excellency, by means of the general cultivation of the country. Of the richness and fertility of its soil we have the most authentic testimonies; in particular, that it abounded in corn, wine, oil, honey, pomegranates, dates, figs, citrons, oranges, apples of Paradise, sugar-canes, cotton, hemp, flax, cedars, cypresses, and ■ great variety of other stately, fragrant, and fruitful trees, balm of Gilead, and other precious drugs, &c. cattle, fowls, fish, game, and other delicacies, as well as necessaries of life. Indeed, whoever considers the very small extent of Judæa, will be sensible that nothing but such astonishing fertility could enable it to maintain such a number of inhabitants as resided in it in the time of king David, since they amounted to 6,000,000. The produce of the land not only sufficed this prodigious multitude, but there was ■ sufficient superfluity to send to Tyre, and other places, for exportation. Yet the soil was only cultivated six years in seven, as the septennial year was always ■ time of rest from the affairs of agriculture. It is to be observed, that the whole of the country was cultivated, and that woods, parks, waste grounds, &c. were unknown. It is now unhappily inhabited by some of the most indolent people existing; yet Dr. Shaw informs us, that, with a little cultivation, it would yield as much as it did in the days of king David and king Solomon.

PALMYRA, ■ called by the Greeks and Romans, Tadmor in the Wilderness in the Scripture, Palmira and Thadamor by Josephus, Tadmor and Tatma by the Arabs and Syrians, stood about fifteen miles east of Damascus. The air is exceeding good, but the soil now barren, (though it formerly had perpetual springs, and yielded fruit and corn,) affording nothing green but a few palm-trees in gardens, and some scattered up and down. Palmyra in the deserts of Arabia, or, as by the Scripture stiled, Tadmor in the Wilderness, is a most awful spectacle. "As you approach (says Dr. Banks, in his System of Geography) the first object which presents itself is ■ ruined castle, on the north side of the city. From it you descry Tadmor, mor, enclosed on three sides by long ridges of mountains. Southward of it is a vast plain, extending far beyond the sight. The city must have been of large extent, from the space now taken up by its ruins; among which live about thirty or forty miserable families, in huts of dirt, within a spacious court, which once enclosed a magnificent temple. This court hath a stately high wall of large square stone, adorned with pilasters both within and without, and are about sixty on each side. The beautiful cornices have been beaten down by the Turks. Towards the centre are the remains of a temple, shrouding the fragments of a temple of exquisite beauty, as appears by what is still standing of its entrance, viz. two stones thirty-five feet long, carved with vines and clusters of grapes. In the great court are the remains of two rows of very noble marble pillars, thirty-seven feet high, with capitals finely carved; and the cornices must have been of equal elegance. Fifty-eight of these pillars are entire. There must have been many more, as it appears they went quite round the court, supporting a most spacious double piazza. The walks on the west side of this piazza, which face the front of the temple, seem to have been grand and spacious; and at each end are two niches for statues at length, with pedestals, borders, supporters, canopies, &c. carved with inimitable art. The space within this once beautiful enclosure is (or rather was) encompassed by another row of pillars of a different order, fifty feet high; sixteen of which are yet standing. The temple was ninety feet long, and about forty broad. Its grand entrance, on the west, appears, by what remains of it, to have been the most magnificent in the world. Over a door-way, in the remaining walls, you trace a spread-eagle: and here are the fragments of cupids, as well as of eagles, most finely imitating nature, on large stones mouldering on the earth. Nothing of the temple stands but the walls, the window-places of which are narrow at top, but richly adorned with sculpture. In the middle is a cupola, all one solid piece. Leaving this court and temple, your eyes are saluted with a great number of pillars of marble, scattered for near a mile. To the north you have a stately obelisk before you, consisting of seven large stones, besides its capital, grandly sculptured. It is more than fifty feet high, and is twelve feet and an half in circumference just above the pedestal; and it is imagined a statue once stood upon it. East and west of this, at the distance of about a quarter of a mile, is another obelisk, that seems to have corresponded with the first mentioned; and, according to the fragment of a third, it should seem that there was a continued range of them. On one of them, which is about forty feet high, there is a Greek inscription, commemorating two patriots: and about an hundred paces from it is a large and lofty entrance, leading to a grand piazza, adorned with marble pillars, on most of which there are inscriptions. A little farther onward, to the left, are the remains of a stately pile of remarkable fine marble, twenty-two feet long. On the west side of the piazza are several openings for gates; two of which appear to have been the most superb that ever captivated the human eye, both in point of grandeur of work in general, and the beautiful porphyry pillars with which they were adorned. Eastward of the piazza are a great number of scattered marble pillars, most of which have been deprived of their elegant capitals. A little ruined temple lies mouldering at a short distance, which appears to have been a very curious structure. But of all the venerable remains, none more attract the admiration than the magnificent sepulchres towards the north of the city, extending a mile and more, and which, at a distance, have the appearance of tops of decayed churches, or bastions of ruined fortifications." The magnificent city of Palmyra is mentioned in the Arabic translation of the Chronicles, as subsisting before the days of Solomon. But John of Antioch, surnamed Malala, says, that it was built by Solomon, and on the very spot where his father slew the Philistine chief. He affirms that the city was built in commemoration of that memorable action. We find, in the ninth chapter of the first book of Kings, and the eighth of the second of Chronicles, that Solomon erected a city in a wilderness, and called it Tadmor: that some time afterwards, the Greeks and Romans distinguished it by the name of Palmyra, even while its first name was still retained by the Syrians: and this is confirmed by St. Jerome, who says, that Tadmor and Palmyra are the Syrian and Greek names of the same place: and the country Arabs, even at this time, call it by the former name. In this circumstance they are remarkably particular, preserving the ancient denomination of places through various revolutions. Thus the Acca of the Old Testament is at this day called by them Acca; and the Greek name Ptolemais, in which that of Acca was for some time immured, is lost through disuse. Not that human judgment can pretend to advance, however, that Palmyra was actually the work of Solomon: an opinion only can be offered, concurrent with that of the present inhabitants, who say, all these things were done by Solomon, the son of David. However, such structures as might have been erected by Solomon we will suppose to have been entirely demolished by Nebuchadnezzar, who, in his march to the siege of Jerusalem, destroyed this city, as we are assured by John of Antioch. It was afterwards beautifully repaired by Adrian; then destroyed by Antiochus, and rebuilt by Aurelian; and at last totally demolished by the ignorant and bigoted Turks, under whose tyranny the whole country lies waste. The greatest figure Palmyra ever made in history was in the reign of Gallienus, under whose shameful indolence the Roman glory in the east became considerably obscured; when Odenathus, joining that emperor's party, collected the poor remains of the discomfited Romans in Syria, whom he led against Sapor, the Persian monarch, put his army to flight, and advanced with his victorious troops to Ctesiphon, the capital of the empire. On his return from this expedition, full of riches and honours, and revered by the Romans, he was unanimously proclaimed Augustus, and co-partner in the empire with Gallienus. Such of the accounts of Odenathus as have reached posterity, serve rather to heighten than gratify the human curiosity. He was a native of Palmyra, and so admirable a politician, that he, for a while, held the balance of power between the empire of Persia and Rome. He drove the Goths out of Asia Minor, where they had committed the most violent ravages: and this was his last great action, in which, it was apprehended, he was treacherously slain by Mæonis, his kinsman. His son, Herodotus, soon afterwards suffered the same fate: nor did Mæonis long survive, being cut to pieces by the soldiery.

The fortune of the beautiful Zenobia, queen of Odenathus, is well worthy the attention of our readers. The vicissitudes which this lady experienced were various and surprising, and her character great and extraordinary; though her memory is tarnished with the suspicion of her having been privy to the deaths of her husband and son. The person of Zenobia was graceful and genteel; her complexion dark brown; her eyes black, and sparkling with uncommon lustre; her teeth beautifully white; her countenance sprightly; her air noble; and her voice clear and powerful. Her strength was unusually great. She inured herself much to fatigue, was fond of riding, and would sometimes march on foot at the head of her troops. In council she was circumspect and prudent; in executing bold and determined. She could be open or reserved, mild or severe, as occasion required. She was generous, but not profuse; and observed inviolably the chastest rules of female honour. No woman was better acquainted with history than this accomplished queen: she was mistress of the Greek and Egyptian tongues, as well as of the Latin, which she translated into the former. She boasted herself descended from Ptolemy, and reckoned Cleopatra among her ancestry. That Zenobia attended her husband in the field there is not the least doubt, since the emperor Aurelian passes the highest encomiums on her military prowess. She assumed, after the death of Odenathus, the reins of government, in the name of her children, and renouncing all alliance with Rome, attacked, and totally routed, the army of Heraclianus, clianus, the Roman general, who was sent against the Persians, he himself narrowly escaping from falling into her hands. She afterwards, while the exigency of public affairs called the attention of Claudius nearer home, asserted an hereditary right to the dominion of Egypt, as being descended from Ptolemy; and having secured a strong party there in her favour, she sent thither Zabdas, an experienced and gallant officer, who had served under Odenathus; and he, defeating the Egyptian army, possessed himself of the province in the name of Zenobia. The Palmyrenes, however, were afterwards routed, and nearly driven from their new acquisitions; but taking advantage of Probus, the Egyptian præfect, who, in endeavouring to cut off the retreat of the vanquished, discovered his ignorance of the country, they totally defeated his army, and himself was taken prisoner; a disgrace which he could not outlive; but, dying by his own hand, left Zenobia mistress of Egypt. The progress of this heroic queen greatly alarmed Claudius, who being now near the end of the second year of his reign, resolved to turn his forces against her; but was cut off by the plague, at Syrmium in Pannonia. He was succeeded by Aurelian, who was not, however, secured in his power without some trouble, and who, before he thought of relieving the eastern empire, reformed the police at Rome, and reduced the Goths, Vandals, and Germans. These great tasks being completed, he crossed the Bosphorus at Bizantium, and having taken Tyana, in Cappadocia, he proceeded to Antioch, of which he possessed himself by stratagem. By two battles, one fought here, the other at Emesa, Aurelian recovered the eastern provinces, and forced the queen to shelter herself within the walls of her capital. Having taken every necessary precaution to supply his army with provisions, Aurelian proceeded to Palmyra; not, however, without being considerably harassed by the Syrian banditti. Arriving at length before the walls of the city, he laid close siege to it, and was gallantly resisted by the garrison. Being wearied out with military operations, the emperor had recourse to negotiations, and made some offers to Zenobia, which she most haughtily rejected, bidding him remember, that her ancestor Cleopatra preferred death to dishonour. This enraging Aurelian, he re-attacked with redoubled vigour; and the besieged being at length reduced to the last extremity, had no resource but that of applying to their allies, the Persians, for relief; and this resolution being agreed on in council, Zenobia herself undertook the carrying it into execution, and, mounting a dromedary, set out for Persia, but was taken prisoner as she was about to cross the Euphrates. Palmyra now soon surrendered, and the emperor took possession. He spared the inhabitants, but carried off the best part of their riches, leaving behind him a garrison of six hundred archers, who, some years after, were cut off by the inhabitants, most of whom were, by the emperor's command, in consequence of the massacre, put to death, and the city quite ruined. The emperor, at Emesa, set on foot an enquiry into the conduct of Zenobia: and here it was that she sullied her great character, by betraying her best friends, among whom was Longinus, by whose advice it was that she had rejected the terms of peace which the emperor Aurelian had proposed: for this he was ordered to be executed; but his mistress was reserved to grace a Roman triumph. She afterwards married, and had children, at Conche, on the road from Rome to the ancient Tiber, where the emperor assigned her some lands, and the remains of her villa are at this day to be seen. Palmyra was afterwards governed by the Romans: and, from a Latin inscription still extant, we discover that Hierocles was for the fifth time president of the provinces, when Dioclesian here erected some magnificent edifices. In the year of Christ 400 the first Illyrian legion was quartered here: but Procopius gives us reason to imagine that the place was so little regarded as to be sometimes left without a garrison. The Roman history makes no farther mention of Palmyra. According to Benjamin Tudulensis there were 2000 Jews among the inhabitants in the twelfth century. We shall conclude our account of this once grand and flourishing city, with the following quotation from an author on the subject: "That Palmyra was used as a place of strength, is evident from alterations which have been made in the castle on the hill, and the Temple of the Sun, which must have been intended for defence, and are not more than five or six hundred years old. The most perfect piece of antiquity is a mausoleum, upwards of seventeen hundred years old, with the flooring entire, and an inscription still legible, informing us that it was built by Jambelicus, son of Mocimus, as a burial-place for himself and family, in the year 314." See Bankes's much admired System of Geography.

PERSIA. The word Persia is supposed to be only a corruption of the word Parthia, and that the modern Persians derive their name from their progenitors the Parthians, the ancient inhabitants of the country. The word itself implies an horseman; and the Persians and Parthians have always been famed for their skill in that exercise. Persia includes all those countries which were anciently celebrated and known by the names of Media, Parthia, part of Assyria, Aipcania, Colchis, Bactria, Iberia, and Sufiana. It is bounded on the north by the Caspian Sea, which separates it from Russia; and on the north-east by the river Oxus, which divides it from Usbec Tartary. The north-west boundaries are the Daghistan mountains, and the mountains of Ararat, which divide it from Circassian Tartary. India is the eastern boundary; the Indian Ocean, and the Gulphs of Persia and Ormus, the southern; and Arabia and Turkey the western. The prodigious mountains of Ararat and Caucasus have long made a distinguished figure in history: nor hath that long chain of mountains, known by the name of Tauris, which run quite through the empire, been less celebrated. From the distracted state of Persia for many successive years, the political division of the provinces cannot be ascertained; but the most remarkable places in the empire are, Ispahan, the metropolis, and residence of the sophi; Schamachie, Ardehil, Sulthania, Caswin, Rom, Reschd, Derbent, Schiras, and the cities of Ormus and Gombroon, on the Persian Gulph. These last are much on the decline at present, though they were formerly places of great commercial consequence. Most of the European nations, particularly the English, have established factories at Gombroon, by means of which they carry on a trade with the Persians, Turks, Tartars, Arabians, Armenians, Banyans, &c. The soil of Persia is in most parts very fertile, producing various kinds of grain, cattle of all kinds, game, and plenty of the choicest fruits. The Persian language is spoken in common throughout the whole empire, but more correctly in some provinces than others. The Turkish is the polite or court language; and the Arabic is the learned language, in which all the books on sublime subjects are written. The sciences flourished in Persia before they did in Europe; but the modern Persians fall very short of the Europeans in every branch of learning. The grand epocha, by which they date all events, is the Hegira, or flight of Mahomet from Mecca, which took place in the year 622. They reckon twenty-four hours to the day, but do not subdivide it into day and night as we do. As they begin their week on Saturday, Friday is their Sabbath. Their year begins at the vernal equinox. Their solar and lunar years differ in the space of twelve days, because they reckon but twelve moons to their lunar year. The most celebrated and singular antiquities in Persia, are the ruins of Persepolis, formerly a superb city, till it was destroyed by Alexander the Great, to oblige the Grecian courtesan Thais. These ruins are about the distance of thirty English miles from the city of Schiras. They are situated in a fine plain, which is about 120 miles in length, and only six or seven in breadth. This plain is overflowed with water several months in the year, which occasions it to be so exceedingly fertile, particularly in rice, that it is covered with little villages, or hamlets, to the number, as the inhabitants assert, of 880, including those which are situated in the adjacent mountains. The ruins appear like an amphitheatre, and are situated in a kind of

of semicircle, formed by the mountains. The ancient palace of the Persian monarchs, which was formerly called the house of Darius, and which the modern inhabitants term Chil-minar, or the Palace of Forty Pillars, is situated at the foot of a mountain, which hath for time immemorial been known by the name of the Royal Mountain. Near the mountains are two ancient sepulchres of Persian monarchs, the fronts of which are ornamented with various figures. Near Derbent there are the ruins of a wall which extend 50 leagues in length; and the wall is said to have reached from the Caspian to the Euxine seas; and on one side of that city are above 6000 grave-stones, most of which have Arabic inscriptions. There is not, perhaps, any kingdom or empire whatever which has undergone greater revolutions than that of Persia, to recount which would be too extensive to be here admitted. We shall therefore only mention the most recent, which was occasioned by the celebrated Kouli Khan, who, in the year 1734, was so exceedingly successful against the Turks and Tartars, as to conquer all the open country of Georgia and Armenia. In 1735 he destroyed great part of the Turkish army at Arpa Kavi. In 1736 the young Shah Abbas (the then emperor) died, when Kouli Khan convened the Persian chiefs and nobles, and told them that they were at liberty to chuse an emperor. They therefore unanimously begged him to accept of the crown, being, indeed, afraid to do otherwise. Having mounted the throne, he ruled the Persians with a rod of iron, destroying many of the royal family, and putting to death all the nobility, except those who were deemed idiots, or whose understanding he despised. He then seized many estates, particularly the church lands; and having concluded a peace with the Turks and Russians, marched into the territories of the Great Mogul, defeated the armies of that monarch, made himself master of Delhi, the capital of Hindostan, took the Great Mogul himself prisoner, put multitudes to the sword, and plundered the empire of jewels, gold, and other valuables, to the amount of 87,500,000*l.* sterling, a greater treasure than any other monarch in any age or nation ever before possessed. These immense treasures he lodged in his hereditary principality of Chalat; but did not trust the guarding of them either to Turks or Persians, but to 12,000 Georgians, all of whom were Christians. He then subdued the Usbeck Tartars, and brought their country to be tributary to Persia: after which he returned to Ispahan, and severely reprimanded his son for the mal-administration of affairs during his absence. The year 1741 he spent in quelling several insurrections. In all these expeditions he committed unheard of cruelties. Among the rebels his eldest son proved one, for he attempted to murder him, but escaped till the year 1742, when he was brought as a prisoner to his father, and had his eyes put out by order of that monarch. The Turks having, in the year 1744, set up a pretender to the throne of Persia, who gave out that he was a younger son of the late emperor Shah Thomas, Kouli Khan sent one of his sons at the head of an army against him. The pretended prince was defeated and taken prisoner. Kouli Khan being informed of this, in a temporary fit of humanity, gave orders that he might be permitted to escape: nevertheless, he directed that 282 of his followers should be beheaded. In the year 1745 he again marched against the Turks, and defeated them; but in 1746 and 1747, he was entirely employed in quelling domestic broils, and intestine rebellions. He was now generally looked upon to be in a state of insanity. His actions were usually absurd, and always unaccountable: sometimes a gleam of generosity and humanity would seem to direct his intentions, but avarice and the most horrid cruelty at most times predominated. He was, however, on the second of July, 1747, assassinated by five of the principal officers of his guards. This event happened thus: the conspirators entered his tent about one o'clock in the morning, when one of them stumbling over some of the cords that fastened it, Kouli Khan waked, started up, seized his sabre, and with one blow cut off the head of him who was next to him. He then struck the next on the left shoulder with such force, that the sabre lodged in the spine or back bone, and stuck so fast that, before he could withdraw it, the remaining assassins dispatched him, and cut off his head, which they took with them, and having buried their companions, they retired. When the people heard of his death they were greatly rejoiced. They immediately put to death his blind son, and his grandson, and even all his women, lest any of them should be pregnant by him; so much did they detest the breed of his cruel and bloody tyrant, who seems to have thrown Nero, and all the inhuman monsters of antiquity, at a distance. Since the death of Kouli Khan, all has been, and still is, anarchy and confusion in that unhappy country. Several of his family, as well as others, have been, and are, contending for the empire; but as their various successes, and the late revolutions, are not known in Europe, at least not properly authenticated, we must conclude our historical observations on the Persian empire.

PELLA, anciently Bunemas, or Bunomia, in Macedonia, was seated at the mouth of the river Actius, and was the birth place of Philip, and his son Alexander the Great, which Philip was there educated. He therefore enlarged it, and made it the capital of Macedonia. It had in its neighbourhood the tomb of Euripides, the celebrated tragic poet. It now lies in ruins, and is, by the Greeks, called Palatisia; i. e. the Little Palace. Fine marbles are daily dug out of its ruins. There were other places of the same name. Pella.

PELUSIUM. Ancient Pelusium is now called the village Belbais, and situated on the Pelusia branch of the Nile, for which reason Damiata is often taken for Pelusium. This place is said to have been surrounded with triple walls. Pelusium.

PENIEL, or Penuel, (signifying, The light of God,) so called by Jacob, on receiving the blessing after his wrestling with the angel, was a place near the brook Jaddok. It became afterwards a city of note; for we find Gideon pulled down one of its towers because they had denied him bread. It was rebuilt by Jeroboam, who likewise erected three others. It stood by the Jordan, and belonged to the tribe of Gad. Strabo mentions a city adjoining to Tripolis, which was called by the same name, at one end of Mount Libanus. Peniel.

PERGAMUS, or Pergamos, a city of the greatest note in Asia Minor, but which, in time, became the metropolis of a separate kingdom, said to be founded about the year of Rome 47, and made a considerable figure, was seated on a spacious plain on the banks of the Caicus. It was the royal seat of the Attalic kings, and of Eumenes, and enriched with a library of 200,000 volumes; for the transcribing of which parchment was here first invented; and by the Latins thence called Charta Pergamena, or Pergamentum. Ptolemy, king of Egypt, gave occasion to this useful contrivance, by prohibiting the exportation of the Papyrus, in order to defeat the design of Eumenes, which was to cause all the valuable books then extant to be carefully transcribed, and thereby make a collection that might vie with Alexander's famed library at Alexandria. Here were likewise invented those costly hangings, by us called tapestry, by the Romans named Aulæa, from Aula, a hall, because the hall of Attalus, who invented them, was the first room adorned with this furniture. Galen, the famed botanist and physician, was born in this city; and here Esculapius is said to have practised physic. To speak of it at present, Pergamos is not a very considerable town (in comparison) of Phrygia, in Asia Minor; but the plain about it is so well watered by the Pitanus, as well as the Caicus, which fall into the Hermus, that it is one of the most fertile in this country, especially in corn. At a small distance is another river, smaller, and more rapid, called, by the ancients, Selenus, which falls into the Caicus a little below the town; on the other side whereof is a stately mosque, formerly a Christian church. The ancient cathedral was dedicated to St. John; but nothing is now left of it, except some of the walls. The Christians here now are but ten or twelve miserable families, who are allowed a church; but the Turks are said to be between 2 and 3000 souls. On the east side stands the ruins of an ancient palace; and many other antiquities are here and there seen, such as a parcel of fine marble columns; a noble bas-relief of a man on horseback, curiously carved; the remains of an aqueduct, of which six arches yet stand over a brook, and farther south six others, with spacious vaults under them.

Petra.

PETRA, the capital of Arabia Petrea, seems to have been denominated, by the Hebrews, Selah, (2 Kings, xiv. 7.) both which words are of the same import, viz. Rock, in Greek and Hebrew; Petra being but a translation of Selah. St. Jerome intimates, that, among the Syrians, it went by the name of Rekem, and that the latter was the same town in the text just quoted, stiled Joktheel. Petra was the chief fortress of the Idumæans, Edomites, or Nabatheans, and derived its name from its rocky situation. It is agreed, that it was accessible only by one narrow path, which, with the steepness of the ascent, rendered it almost impregnable. It was seated in a plain full of gardens, but surrounded with rocks, according to Strabo. Pliny says nearly the same, and that the Nabatheans inhabited the city of Petra, situated in a plain watered by a river, and encompassed by inaccessible mountains. A great diversity of opinions in this particular prevails among the moderns; but we shall only observe, that it is, by the approved judicious, allowed most probable that Errakim, or Arrakeh, a town in a north direction from Hagra, near Caracha, seems to correspond best with the Petra of the ancients. There were several other places which had the name of Petra; and particularly one in the third Palestine; but then, as Jerome and Eusebius extend Palestine as far as the Red Sea to Elath, it comprehended Idumæa and Arabia Petrea.

Phaselus.

PHASELUS was a tower in Jerusalem, of very great circumference.

Phiala.

PHIALA Lake, situated not far from the Samachonite Lake, in the Holy Land, is now known to be the true source of the Jordan. That it was so was long disputed, but the doubt was decided by Philip the Tetrarch, who casting straw or chaff into it, they came out at Panion. The name, which signifies a phial, was common to other waters of the same kind. It is situated in the midst of a most delightful country, which is also so well adapted for the carrying on of business, that marts or fairs are held there all the summer by the neighbouring people.

Philippi.

PHILIPPI properly belongs to Thrace, but is by most geographers placed in Macedon, pursuant to the division ever since the time of Philip, the father of Alexander, who, having reduced the country between the Strymon (the ancient boundary of Macedon) and the Nessus, or Nestus, added it to his hereditary kingdom, whence that tract was ever after looked on as a part of Macedon. It afterwards became a Roman colony. It was situated on a rising ground, abounding with springs; having on the north side several hills, covered with woods; on the south a marsh, which reached to the Ægean Sea; on the east the straits of Symbdon; and on the west a large plain extending to the Strymon. On this plain, the probable boundary between Macedon and Thrace, was the memorable battle between Brutus and Cassius, and Anthony and Octavianus, afterwards Augustus. St. Paul preached in this city, converted many, and wrote to them from Rome the epistle we have in the New Testament by such title. To speak of it in its present state, it is situated near the borders of Rumania, about 190 miles from Constantinople. The Greeks, we are told, still call it Philippige (Land of Philip.) The first thing apparent to travellers is the castle on a mountain, very large, and the walls almost entire. On the feveral hills, which surround this mountain, stand divers fortresses communicating with the castle, being encompassed with large walls, which extend into the plain. Within the place are several heaps of free-stones and pieces of marble, but no footsteps of buildings. There are a great number of edifices half demolished. It is natural to suppose here were stately temples of white marble, sumptuous palaces, and magnificent monuments; the broken remains of all which afford beholders a grand idea of ancient architecture. This town is still an archbishop's see; but it retains nothing of its ancient splendor, and is very thin peopled.

PTOLEMAIS. Ptolemy makes Ptolemais, and Barca, in Cyrenia, two different cities, placing the former in the island, the latter on the coast. This Ptolemais is now commonly called Tolmeta.

R.

RABBATH, or RABBAH, (a word importing great and populous,) the metropolis of the Ammonites, to distinguish it from the city of Moab, which bore the same name or epithet, was called Rabbah of the children of Ammon. This capital seems to have been distinguished into two parts, Rabbah properly so called, and the City of Waters. Whence these waters were derived to it, whether from the Jabbok, or from exuberant springs in or about it, is not determined. We have some authority to say, it was the most delightful part of the city, and that the king's house stood there, from whence this part may have been stiled the Royal City. This part (before which fell the brave Uriah) Joab took, and then sent to David, who came accordingly, with all his forces, and took the other part. Rabbah was also famous for being the place where the great iron bedstead of Og, king of Bashan, was seen. In process of time, this city was called Philadelphia, from Ptolemy Philadelphus, who sumptuously rebuilt it, and for ages was a city of eminence.

RAGABA was a fortress in the territory of the Gerazens, beyond Jordan.

RAPHIA, a city, is placed by Strabo and Livy in Phœnicia, by Ptolemy in Samaria, and by Pliny in Idumæa. But as it stood near Gaza, between it and Rhinocolura, it is by other geographers counted amongst those of Palestine. It is particularly famous for the decisive battle between Antiochus, king of Syria, and Ptolemy Euergetes, wherein the former was defeated, forced to withdraw to Antioch, and quit all his conquests.

REPHAIM. The Valley of Rephaim, from a text in Joshua, appears to lie near Jerusalem, in the confines at least of Judah and Benjamin. Travellers inform us, that the road from Jerusalem to Bethlehem lies through this valley, famous for being the theatre of several victories obtained by David over the Philistines. As to the Rephaims, considered as a nation, race, or family, they are mostly placed in Bashan, where reigned Og, the declared last of their race. They were, as the name manifests, men of gigantic stature, that of Og himself being represented by the size of his bedstead, &c. In the book of Genesis, the Rephaims are reckoned as one of the ten nations whose land was promised to the seed of Abraham.

RHINOCOLURA was situated near the mouth of the Bafan, (supposed that called in scripture, River of the Wilderness,) and placed, by ancient geographers, sometimes in Syria and sometimes in Egypt, to which last kingdom it once belonged. It is now, we are told, called Pharamica, and was strongly fortified during the holy war, to prevent the Turkish auxiliaries coming out of Egypt into Palestine, since which time it is gone to decay, and is an inconsiderable place.

SABA in Arabia Felix. The Sabæi seem to have possessed a considerable territory in the S. and best part of this peninsula. It was celebrated amongst the ancients for the vast quantity of frankincense it produced. Saba, its metropolis, according to ancient geographers, stood upon an hill at no considerable distance from the Red Sea, being a large, opulent and strong city. It was defended by a castle, and, as has been supposed by many learned men, together with the Arab nation in general, the residence of the queen of Sheba. The Arabs assert both the town and district to have been so denominated from Saba, the son of Jexhab, and grandson of Joktan, whose name imports to lead into captivity, because he was the first who reduced men to a state of servitude. The aforesaid Sheba is said, besides this city of her name, to have built that famous mound which formed the vast reservoir about it, by means whereof, it receiving all the waters that came down from the mountains, the kings of Yaman did not only supply the inhabitants of Saba and their lands with water, but likewise kept the territories they had subdued in greater awe, for by cutting them off from a communication with it, they could at any time greatly distress them. This building stood like a mountain above the city, and was by the Sabæans esteemed so strong, that they were under no apprehension of its ever failing. Each family had a portion of the water distributed by the aqueducts. But at length a mighty flood broke down the mound by night, while the inhabitants were asleep, and carried away the city with the neighbouring towns and people. This inundation in the Koran, styled, "The inundation of Al-Aren," occasioned so terrible a destruction, that thenceforth it became proverbial, thus to express a total dispersion, "They were gone and scattered like Sheba." It is the most received opinion that this catastrophe happened about the time of Alexander the Great.

SAMARIA (or Sebaste) was situated in the tribe of Ephraim, 45 miles N. of Jerusalem. It was the capital city of the kingdom, and royal seat of the kings of Israel, till a period was put to that kingdom. Hence Samaria often in the Old Testament denotes such whole kingdom. Samaria, when under king Ahab, was twice besieged by Benhadad, king of Syria, and other confederate princes, with an immense army, and, in the course of the latter siege, reduced to the direst extremity: the army, however, at length, through a judicial terror, raised the siege with the utmost precipitation. In the year before Christ 721 Salamanazar, king of Assyria, took the city after three years, and carried away ten tribes of Israel (or most of them) into captivity, and so put an end to that kingdom after it had stood 254 years divided from that of Judah. The enemy committed the most horrid cruelties on their captives, so that Samaria was reduced almost to an heap of rubbish, and all the land laid waste. This melancholy and fatal end of that kingdom happened in the 6th year of Hezekiah and 9th of Hosea. But Samaria must have been soon repaired, for colonies were thereupon sent either by Salamanazar, or his successor, to re-people the land of Israel, chiefly from Cutha, whence the new inhabitants were called Cutheans. From some religious and other causes it seems a mutual hatred subsisted between the Jews and Samaritans, the former abominating even the name of the latter, and those on their part always disclaiming any kindred with them in time of adversity, though forward enough to claim it in time of prosperity. After divers revolutions it was at length taken by Aristobulus, and its region, together with Galilee, and again restored to Judea. Samaria was partly rebuilt by Gabinius, and new called Sebaste by Herod, who put the finishing stroke to it. It was made the metropolis of Palestine Secunda under the Romans, and an archbishopric under the Christians. Herod Agrippa obtained it of the emperor Caligula, and siding with the Romans against the Jews under Vespasian, they at that time avoided the common calamity of the country. But afterwards, taking other measures, they were, together with the rest of the Jews, extirpated out of Palestine by Adrian, and the city has since gone to decay. The melancholy fragments of this once famous city stand upon a long mound of an oval figure, having first a fruitful valley, and then a rising hill running about it. The Turks have erected a mosque here, into which they let any Christian for a small piece of money.

SAMOSATA, once the capital of Comagena Proper, was situated on the Euphrates, near the confines of Armenia Major. It was the residence of Antiochus Asiaticus, after Pompey had confined his kingdom to this small province, and stripped him of the rest of Syria. It was the native place of the witty Lucian. It is now called Scempsi, but is only a poor village, surrounded with an heap of ruins of the ancient city.

SCYTHOPOLIS. See BETHISAN.

SELEUCIA. There were nine cities of this name built by Seleucus, but distinguished by some adjunct; some of the most eminent of which follow. Seleucia on the Tigris, so called from Seleucus Nicanor, its founder, who made it the metropolis of his empire beyond the Euphrates. Seleucia, surnamed Trachonitis, or Aspera, (an appellation well agreeing with the mountains and rocky country of Cilicia, on which it stood,) about twelve miles from the sea, on the banks of the Calicednus. Its bishopric became subject to the patriarch of Constantinople about the ninth century. Its modern name is Selechi. Seleucia, surnamed Pieria, on the north side of the Orontes, now reduced to a poor village called Seluki Jelber. Seleucia Pisidia, called Seleucia ad Taurum, because it stood on some part of that ridge of mountains; and Seleucia Ferrea, perhaps from iron mines or manufactures, is now in ruins.

SEPPHORIS, a city of Galilee. It stood in the tribe of Zebulun, and was one of the first cities in Galilee on the road from Ptolemais. It became in time the metropolis of that province, when the emperor gave it to young Agrippa. The younger Varus, the Roman general, taking it, sold the inhabitants by auction, set fire to the city, and reduced it to ashes. Herod Antipater having the territory of Galilee for his share of the government, rebuilt it, and surrounded it with strong walls, so that it became one of the best cities in the canton.

SHILOH in Canaan, where was set up the tabernacle, in which was kept the ark, and where the ark remained till just before the death of Eli, was situated in the tribe of Ephraim. After the Philistines took the ark, Shiloh fell so to decay, that Jeremiah, foretelling the destruction of Jerusalem, says, it would be brought into the same ruinous condition with Shiloh. And Jerome says there was nothing left of it in his time but the foundation of the altar of burnt sacrifices.

SICHEM, Sechem, or Shechem. The proper and original name seems to have been Shalem, which in time grew out of use amongst the Israelites, they calling it Shechem and Sicheim, from Shechem, the son of Hamor. It stood ten miles E. from Hyrcania, was several times ruined and rebuilt, had been one of the cities of refuge given to the Levites, and was made the metropolis of Samaria, after the demolishing the city of that name.

SIDON is properly to be styled the metropolis of Phoenicia. It borrowed its name from Sidon, the eldest son of Canaan, by whom it is said to have been built; though it is not universally agreed, that the name was derived from the said Sidon. Sidon is said to have been the greatest of the maritime cities in general, having long enjoyed an enriching trade, which caused such voluptuousness in the inhabitants, that to live at ease and pleasure is denoted in Judges

Judges xviii. 7, by living after their manner. The men being shipwrights were very famous for having timber (See 1 Kings v. 6.) and therefore Solomon had thence his principal workmen to build the temple. They are allowed also to have been excellent artificers in other trades, and said to have been the first makers of chrystal glaſs. It was taken by the Saracens in 936, and recovered, repaired, and fortified by the Christians in 1103, and was held by the Teutonic knights, and had a fort guarded by the knight templars, ſince which the Turks, having made themſelves maſters of it, have let it run into decay. It is now named Said or Sayd, and is ſituated in a fertile and delightful ſoil, though but a ſmall town. The great moſque is handſome as well as large, and the public bagnio is in good condition. The haven is large but unſafe, and the ſhips are forced to ride under a ſmall ridge of rocks about a mile from ſhore on the northern ſide. Sidon is reckoned to contain about 6000 inhabitants. The Turks have 14 mosques, Roman Catholics, and Greeks, each a church, and the Maronites a chapel. They carry on a conſiderable trade. Proviſions are very plenteous and cheap, and the air is ſo clear as to attract wild beaſts and birds in great numbers into the country adjacent. Sidon, by a grant of the pope, gave title to an archbiſhop.

Siloah.

SILLOAH, or Siloam, is a fountain in the valley of Jehoshaphat, from which all the gardens of it are watered. The Turks hold this water ſo ſacred, that numbers of them almoſt every day waſh therein. Its waters are now ſaid to be an immediate cure for fevers. Over againſt this fountain, on the other ſide of the valley, is the place called Siloe, where Solomon is ſaid to have kept his ſtrange wives.

Sin.

SIN, wilderneſs of. This wilderneſs, we are told in Exodus, lay between Elim and Sinai. Here it was that heaven firſt ſent the Iſraelites manna.

Sinai.

SINAI, wilderneſs and mount. There are many windings and difficult ways between the deſerts of Sin and Sinai. The latter is a beautiful plain more than one league broad, near three long, lying open to the north-weſt, but cloſed up to the ſouth by ſome of the lower eminences of the mount. In this direction likewiſe the higher parts of it make ſuch encroachments upon the plain, that they divide it into two parts, each of them capacious enough for the Iſraelites whole encampment. There are now convents upon this ſpot, and ſuch ludicrous and entuſiaſtic ſtories related concerning religious bigots, as cannot be deſcribed without offending a ſerious and intelligent reader.

Sodom.

SODOM ſeems to have been the chief of the five cities, and the delightful plain or valley in which it ſtood allured Lot to pitch his tent near it, and afterwards to dwell in it, though ſo deteſtably infamous for that moſt odious and ſhocking crime againſt nature, from which this city derived its name.

Straton's Tower.

STRATON'S Tower. See Cæſarea.

Succoth.

SUCCOTH was the name of two places. That in Exodus was the place of the Iſraelites firſt encampment after their departure from Rameſes. But little of the geography of this, and ſome other places mentioned in the journal of the Iſraelites, is at this time known. This Succoth muſt not be confounded with that ſituated near the river Jordan, between that and the Jabbok, which Jacob called by that name when he came out of Meſopotamia; tho' the former may have been ſo called in imitation of the latter, on account of the booths or tents which the people ſet up there.

Suſa.

SUSA. The Scripture Shuſan (now called Schouſter) was the metropolis of the Suſiana province, built on the banks of the river Eulæus (by Daniel called Ulai) by Memnon, as ſome ſay, who was ſlain by the Theſſalians in the Trojan war. Strabo and Pausanias compare its walls even with thoſe of Babylon. It is called Memnonica, by Herodotus and others, from Memnon its founder. In Scripture it is conſtantly named the Palace; but beſides the king's palace, there was doubtleſs a city, as is plain from all the prophane writers. The wealth and magnificence of this city may be gathered from the vaſt wealth found in it by Alexander the Great, when it was ſurrendered to him ſome little time after the battle of Arbela, or rather Gaugamela, twenty days after his departure from Babylon, which had before been delivered up to him. Here Ahaſuerus kept his great feaſt 185 days. It is ſaid this city now lies in ruins by the name of Schouſter.

TARICHEA was a town of Galilee, ſituate on an eminence by the lake of Genezareth, over againſt Gamala. It having been beſieged by Titus both by land and water, made a deſperate defence, till a diſſention happened within, which coming to the ears of the Roman general, it was taken by ſtorm.

TARSHISH, ſon of Javan, ſettled in the eaſt part of the ſouth track of Aſia Minor is very probable; for the name of Tarſus, the chief town of Cilicia, is thought to carry ſome probable marks of its being firſt founded by Tarſhiſh himſelf, or ſome of his deſcendants. It is affirmed by an hiſtorian of credit, that the city was ſo called from Tarſhiſh, and that Cilicia was originally known by the name of Tarſhiſh. Indeed, it is ſcarcely doubted that this was the Tarſhiſh ſo often mentioned by the prophets on account of its trading with Tyre.

TARSUS, in Cilicia as aforeſaid, ſeems to have borrowed its name from Tarſhiſh. It was at firſt the metropolis of Cilicia, and after Conſtantine's diſſiſion of Cilicia Prima. It was the native city of St. Paul (though an Hebrew of the Hebrews, or a Jew both by father and mother's ſide,) and, according to Strabo in former times, not inferior, for the ſtudy of philoſophy and polite literature, either to Athens or Alexandria. The inhabitants enjoyed the privileges of Roman citizens according to the Parthian Law, which the apoſtle thought proper to claim and uſe upon ſeveral occaſions, as recorded in the Acts. The Tarſians, to ingratiate themſelves with Julius Cæſar, changed the city's name into Juliopolis; but the old name ſurvived the new; and it is to this day by the Greeks called Terſia, or Teraſſa, by the Turks Tarſow, and ſometimes Hernia. It is ſo reduced that the remains hardly merit notice.

TAURUS is the greateſt mountain of Aſia, and heretofore thought the greateſt in the world. It runs from weſt to eaſt under ſeveral names, through divers large kingdoms and countries even to India, whereby all Aſia is divided into two parts, of which that on the north ſide is called Aſia intra Taurum, and that on the ſouth Aſia extra Taurum. It alſo paſſes between Armenia and Meſopotamia, and ſends forth many branches under divers particular names towards north and ſouth.

THABOR, Mount, of which name there was a city upon it, called Itabyrion, or Itabyr, and Atabyrion, in the plain of Eldraelon, in Judæa, not far diſtant from Nazareth. In the 7th century it is deſcribed to have been of wonderful regularity, verdant and florid. A modern traveller thus deſcribes it. "It has a plain area at top moſt fertile and delicious, of an oval figure. This area is enclosed with trees on all parts, except to the ſouth. It was anciently environed with walls, trenches, and other fortifications, of which it exhibits many remains at this day."

TIBERIAS. See Genezareth. Herod the Tetrarch of Galilee (Antipas) building a city on the north bank of Genezareth, and calling it Tiberias, in honour of Tiberius, the lake thence took this name alſo. The city was built on a ſpot full of ſepulchres:

pulchres: but the great privileges granted by Herod to people for becoming inhabitants, which overcame their scruple of conscience as to pollution by dead bodies, &c. made it quickly become one of the principal cities of these parts. It is said to have had in it 13 synagogues and an academy; that here was the last session of the Sanhedrim, or chief council of the Jews; and here the Talmud, or body of the Jewish civil and canon law, was collected.

TIMNAH. TIMNAH was first assigned to the tribe of Judah, but afterwards to that of Dan. In the days of Eusebius and Jerome, a great town, named Thamnah, lay in the borders of Diapolis, towards Jerusalem, which is supposed to have been the same with that formerly called Timnah.

TIRZAH. TIRZAH is mentioned frequently in sacred history, as being long the regal city of the kings of Israel. From an expression in the Canticles, it appears to have been beautiful and pleasant to live in; but its situation is not certainly determined.

TRACHONITIS. TRACHONITIS, a region of Judea, which seems to have derived its name from two famous mountains, which Strabo calls Trachones. The greatest part of it had such ridges of rocks and mountains, especially on the sides of Arabia and Iturea, that some of them had caverns large enough to lodge 1000 men. It, together with Iturea, made one tetrarchy in the time of Our Saviour. Luke iii. 1.

TRIPOLIS. TRIPOLIS, in Phœnicia, called Ruad by the Turks, and Tripolis in Syria, to distinguish it from others, stands on the Levant Sea, the same coast with Jamnia and Joppa, above Sidon. It had its name from its forming three cities, each one furlong distant from the other; one whereof belonged to the Aradians, or ancient kingdom of Arad; the second to the Sidonians; and the third to the Tyrians. It is still divided into the upper and lower city, and is in a flourishing condition, being large, populous, and strong, adorned with mulberry-tree plantations for silk-worms, from which is drawn considerable profit. The walls are strong, and fortified with several towers. The castle is the residence of the beglerbeg, and garrisoned by two hundred janissaries. It is a strong fortress, situated on an eminence, and well stored with cannon. On account of its importance, it is deemed the metropolis of Phœnicia. The haven is rather an open sea than an enclosed harbour, unless that it is partly defended by two small islands about two leagues from it. There are six square towers, or castles, along the shore, well fortified with artillery. The town contains about 8000 houses, and 60,000 inhabitants, who consist of Turks, Jews, and Christians. The river hath a good stone bridge over it for the convenience of passengers, and the stream turns several mills. The air is extremely clear and healthy, the country about very rich and fruitful, and the town supplied with every thing desirable. Among the handsome buildings is a great mosque, once a Christian church, a large and stately edifice. The Christians have some monasteries and handsome chapels, and the Jesuits an handsome college. This city was famous in the holy war, being one of the four capital cities the Christians had in these parts.

TROGLODYTES. TROGLODYTES. In their manner of life the greatest part of them nearly resembled the Libyan Nomades. They were divided into tribes, but all under one head. A part of them fought with clubs, carrying before them round shields, made of raw ox hides. Many, however, used bows and arrows.

TYRE. TYRE, on the coast of Phœnicia Proper, was anciently named Sor. It is commonly called the Daughter of Sidon, and stood also upon the sea, 200 furlongs to the south of Sidon. It had two havens, one looking towards Sidon, the other towards Egypt; from whence it is plain that Tyre on the Island, and Old Tyre on the Main, were considered as but one city after the isthmus was thrown up between them, and possibly there might have been buildings contiguous to each other. This famous emporium was never of very great extent, for which reason they built so very lofty, and with more stories, it is said, than the houses at Rome. The buildings, in general, were spacious and magnificent; and above the rest appeared the temples built by king Hiram to Jupiter, Hercules, and Astarte. It is now called Sur, and is a mere babel of broken walls, pillars, vaults, &c. there not being one entire house left. Its present inhabitants are only a few poor wretches, who harbour in vaults, and subsist chiefly by fishing. King Hiram is famed, in sacred history, for maintaining a strict friendship and alliance with king David, presenting him with cedars, and sending him skilful workmen to build a palace. He entertained the same affection for his son and successor, Solomon, which occasioned an interchange of letters of amity. Tyre was besieged 13 years together by Nebuchadnezzar, who at length subdued it, when he put all the inhabitants he could find to the sword, and destroyed the ancient city. But many of the people had, in time, prudently retired, with the chief of their effects, to an island at some distance from the shore, where they built New Tyre, or Tyre on the Island. The city, however, at length, submitted to Nebuchadnezzar, who appointed Baal subordinate king thereof, under his own supreme authority. In the reign of Azelmic, Tyre was besieged by Alexander the Great, and taken by storm, after holding out seven months. After destroying the place, and murdering the inhabitants, he was very sorry for his rashness; and, like other men of the same precipitate disposition, who became wise too late, determined to add one evil to another; in consequence of which resolution he seized most of the artificers in the neighbouring countries, and having compelled them to rebuild the city, he obliged them to reside in it, lest he should have a great city without any inhabitants. Such was the conduct of many of the great heroes of antiquity, who fought for fighting sake, did injuries instead of redressing them, and quarrelled with every body to avoid being idle. Mr. Pope very justly observes,

No. 59.

Heroes are much the same, it is agreed,
From Macedonia's madman to the Swede:
The whole strange purpose of their lives to find,
Or make, an enemy of all mankind:
Not one looks backward, onward still he goes,
Yet never sees an inch beyond his nose.

Having thus rebuilt and re-peopled this ancient city, Alexander thought proper to stile himself the Founder of Tyre, in order, it may be supposed, to prevent the people from recollecting that he had been the destroyer of Tyre. The city, in time, recovered its beauty and opulence, became confederate with the Romans, and was invested with the privileges of a Roman city on account of its great fidelity. In the times of primitive Christianity, it was made the metropolitan see for the province of Phœnicia. In 636 it was conquered by the Saracens, but in 1124 recovered by the Christians. In 1280 it was finally subdued by the Turks, in whose hands it has continued ever since. Those infidels took it soon after the reduction of Acra, or Acre, where they committed such unheard-of cruelties, that the Tyrians, terrified with the report thereof, betook themselves to their ships at midnight, and abandoned the city to their fury. They entered it the next day, and reduced it to the deplorable situation of which the dismal ruins are still a monument. We must not omit to observe, that the Tyrians were particularly celebrated for dying purple, which was first found out by them from an accident, viz. a dog's lips being finely tinged by eating of the fish called conchilis. This fish is a buccinum, a name given by the ancients to all fishes whose shells bear any resemblance to an hunting horn; and it appears from Pliny, that the famed Tyrian purple was obtained from it. This dye was so much valued in the time of the Roman emperors, on account of its being the imperial colour, that only one pound of it cost a thousand Roman denarii, or above thirty pounds sterling.

V.

Vienna.

VIENNE, capital of the province of Viennois, about 7 leagues from Lyons, at the foot of a mountain on the Rhine, has been a large, famous city, but now is not above a fourth of what it was, having its two old fortresses demolished. The Allobroges are said to have founded it; and it became a colony of the Romans, who adorned it with a palace, amphitheatre, and other magnificent works, the ruins whereof are yet seen. It was some time the capital of Burgundy. The cathedral is a stately pile, as are some other churches and public buildings. The inhabitants are expert in manufactures, particularly of plates of iron and steel, paper, &c. by mills and engines.

Ur.

UR, of the Chaldees, where Abraham was born, and whence he removed, at the Divine call, to Charan, and so to Canaan. The word Ur signifies fire. The most probable opinion therefore is, that the city might be so denominated from its inhabitants being worshippers of the sun, and of fire, its emblem, and for having temples wherein the sacred fire was kept always burning. The Chaldees were famed for it, and carried it, in great pomp, at the head of their armies when they went to battle.

Z.

Zebulon.

ZEBULON, his lot, or the land of his tribe. Jacob, in his prophetic blessing of his son Zebulon, says, that he shall dwell at the haven of the sea, and he shall be for an haven of ships, and his border shall be unto Sidon. And so it happened, that tribe's possession being from the Mediterranean, on the west, to the lake of Genezareth, on the east, side.

ZIPH, Wilderness of. We find in Joshua a city called Ziph, mentioned together with Carmel and Maon. We have also, in the history of David, mention made of Carmel and Maon as adjoining to Ziph. So that it is not to be doubted, but in the wilderness where was David, and where was the hill Aschelah, is to be understood Ziph near Carmel and Maon. This is placed, by Jerome, eight miles east from Hebron.

ZOAR. The Syriac version reads Zoan. It was probably the most ancient royal seat of the Pharaoh's; for the miracles wrought by Moses and Aaron before one of them, are expressly said, in the Psalms, to be done in the field of Zoan. Zour.

ZOBAB. That the country of Zobah pertained to the Syrians, is evident from 2 Sam. x. 6. where we read expressly of the Syrians of Zobah; and, from their being hired by the Ammonites, it appears that Zobah lay in the parts adjoining to the Ammonites. The kingdom of Damascus is looked upon by the learned to have arisen out of that of Zobah, or to be no other than one and the same kingdom, which formerly had Zobah, and afterwards Damascus, for its capital city, as the seat of its kings. To the south of Zobah lay the land of Ishob. Zobah.

He is again anointed and declared king in a general assembly of the people, ib. Incurs the Divine displeasure, and that of Samuel, for disobedience, 86. Is threatened by the prophet with the loss of his kingdom, ib. Marches with a body of 600 men, in company with Jonathan his son, to Gibeah, ib. Marches against and totally defeats the Philistines, ib. Erects an altar, and offers sacrifices upon it, ib. Denounces a rash curse against any of the army who should eat or drink till the close of the day, in which his son Jonathan is involved, but screened from punishment by the people, 87. Account of his progeny, chariots, guards, &c. ib. Overthrows the Amalekites, but spares Agag their king, ib. Conceives an enmity and jealousy against against David, for whose life he lays snares, 90. Endeavours, with his own hand, to slay him, contrary to his oath, 91. Is endued with the spirit of prophecy, ib. Enquires for David, at a festival, that he might put him to death, and severely reprehends Jonathan, whom he attempts to slay, for befriending him, 92. Cenfures Abimelech, the high-priest, for entertaining David, and puts him to death, with his family, and all the sacerdotal race, 93. Refumes his pursuit of David, into whose hands he falls, confesses his ill treatment of him, and asks forgiveness, 94; 95. Marches again with 3000 men against David, who had power to take away his life, but forbears, for which he receives the public thanks of the king, 96. Being deserted by God, he applies to the witch of Endor to raise up the ghost of Samuel, in order to consult him in his distress, ib. Is slain, with his sons, in an engagement with the Philistine army, 97. His posterity put to death by the Gibeonites, 111.

The Publisher of this Work returns his grateful Acknowledgements to the Subscribers for their Encouragement, and solicits Continuance of their Favours to some of his other Publications, (a List of which may be seen in his Catalogue,) assuring them that nothing shall be wanting to render the Works in which he shall be engaged deserving the Public Patronage.

Notwithstanding the Publisher gave Two printed Notices for the Subscribers to send in their Names, and the Publication of the latter Numbers was delayed several Weeks, in order to give those who live at a great Distance the Opportunity of having their Names appear in this List, he has not been able to procure the Names of near one quarter of the Subscribers: He hopes that those whose Names are omitted will not be offended: and begs that he may not be blamed if any are found wrong spelt, as he has taken great Care to have them printed literally as they were delivered by the Booksellers, Stationers, Newsmen, &c.
